1 Cfr. Lega, Compendium de Iudiciis Eccl., 1906 n. 419 ff., p. 220 f. Incidental questions might also be called side issues or special demurrers; see Blackstone, III, § 313 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ad causam pertinet ut resolvi plerumque debeat ante quaestionem principalem.

CAN. 1838

Causa incidens proponitur vel oretenus vel per libellum, indicato nexu qui intercedit inter ipsam et causam principalem, et servatis, quoad eius fieri poterit, regulis can. 1706–1725 statutis.

CAN. 1839

Iudex, libello vel petitione verbali receptis, auditis partibus, et, si opus sit, promotore iustitiae, vel vinculi defensore, secum deliberet num proposita incidens quaestio futilis sit et ad retardandum principale iudicium unice excitata; itemque num causa incidens talis sit naturae et tali nexu cum causa principali cohaereat, ut ante eam resolvi debeat. Si ita se res habeat, libellum vel instantiam admittat; aliter decreto suo eam reiiciat.

1. An incidental question is one which, though not expressly contained in the introductory bill, is so intimately conected with the point at issue that it must be settled before the principal controversy is defined, for instance, the competency of the judge. Every such question must be proposed after the trial has begun, i.e., after the summons was duly made, and it may be introduced by the party himself or by the promotor iustitiae, or by the defensor vinculi, if these officials are present.

2. A side-issue may be proposed either orally or in writing. But its connection with the main issue must be pointed out and the question raised must be in keeping with the rules laid down for the bill and the summons,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

as stated in can. 1706–1725. If there are several incidental questions, the ordo cognitionum, as set forth in can. 1627–1635, must be observed.

3. After having received the oral or written petition for a hearing of incidental questions, the judge shall first invite the parties and, if necessary, also the promotor iustitiae and the defensor vinculi, to hear their opinion. Then he shall deliberate with himself whether the side-issue raised has any solid foundation, or is futile, or only raised in order to delay the settlement of the main issue. He shall also carefully consider whether the incidental question is of such a nature and so connected with the main issue that it requires preliminary settlement. If this is the case, he shall admit the petition; otherwise he shall issue a decree rejecting it.

FORM OF SETTLING INCIDENTAL QUESTIONS

CAN. 1840

§ 1. Utrum incidens quae excitetur questio, definienda sit iudicii forma servata, an mero decreto, iudex, attenta rei qualitate et gravitate, aestimet.

§ 2. Si causa incidens sit iudicialiter definienda, regulae, quoad eius fieri poterit, servandae sunt, quae in ordinariis iudiciis obtinent; curet tamen iudex ut dilationum termini sint quam maxime breves.

§ 3. Iudex in decreto quo, non servata iudicii forma, vel reiicit vel definit quaestionem incidentem, rationes quibus innititur, in iure et in facto breviter exponat.

CAN. 1841

Antequam finiatur causa principalis, iudex interlocutoriam sententiam potest, iusta intercedente causa,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

corrigere aut revocare sive ex se, auditis partibus, sive ad instantiam unius partis audita altera parte, et requisito semper voto promotoris iustitiae aut defensoris vinculi, si adsint.

If the judge refuses to admit the incidental question by a formal decree, no appeal from this decision is permitted, unless — which, however, is hardly imaginable — his decision should forestall, or amount to, a final sentence.[2] But if he admits the incidental question, there are, according to our Code, which introduces new regulations in this matter, two ways open to settle the side-issue:

a) A mere formal decree may be issued by the judge, with due regard to the character and weight of the side-issue, or

b) The matter may be settled in judiciary form.

If the settlement is made by decree of the judge, who has either refused to admit the incidental question or solved it without the formality of a judiciary trial, he must briefly state the reasons of law and fact for his decree. The reason of law, or special demurrer, may be based on the lack of a formal rule which the law would otherwise prescribe. A reason of fact would be if the fact itself were denied or disputed, for instance, the enmity of the judge towards the other party.

If the judge, after due deliberation, has decided to settle the incidental question in judiciary form, he must, as far as possible, proceed along the lines prescribed for ordinary trials, but should take special care that the dilatory term be shortened as much as possible.

The text undoubtedly refers to the ordinary method

2 Trid., Sess. 13, c. 1; Sess. 24, cc. 10, 20, de ref.; Lega, l. c., n. 426, p. 221.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of procedure, i.e., the observatio solemnis ordinis iudiciarii, to the apparent exclusion of summary proceedings. It was generally admitted before the promulgation of the Code that, in settling incidental controversies, a summary procedure was sufficient. Our text seems positively to exclude it. The reason is not far to seek. The judge is ordinarily permitted to settle such issues by a formal decree, but if the matter is of great importance, the regular judiciary way should be adopted. Yet the text seems covertly to admit summary procedure, because it adds: "quoad eius fieri poterit."

The essential requisites for a summary procedure are the following:

1. The petition or bill containing the controversy, as stated in can. 1706 ff., but no solemnis libelli oblatio.[3]

2. The summons, as described in can. 1711 ff.

3. The means of evidence, to which belong the questioning of the parties and all kinds of evidence; but the oath of the witnesses[4] and the iuramentum calumniae are not essential.

4. The grant of dilatory terms and exceptions, which, however, according to our Code, must be reduced to the shortest possible time, in order not to delay the final sentence unnecessarily; but no solemn closing of the procedure is required.

5. The interlocutory sentence, according to can. 1868 ff., which, though void of accidental solemnities, must be given in writing.

This last named sentence, according to can. 1841, proffered before the main issue is settled, may be corrected or revoked by the judge for any just reason, be-

3 Cfr. Lega, l. c., n. 457 f.; Messmer, l. c., p. 88 f.

4 See can. 1767, § 3. On the iuramentum calumniae the Code is silent.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cause it does not terminate the office of either the delegated or the ordinary judge. For this reason the judge shall hear the parties in order to learn, whether they think themselves injured or curtailed in their rights by the interlocutory sentence. If one party insists upon a change or correction in the interlocutory sentence, the other party, too, must be heard. If the promotor iustitiae or the defensor vinculi are present, their opinion must also be asked.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER I

CONTUMACY OR CONTEMPT OF COURT

As stated above, there are incidental questions common to all trials. One of these is contumacy, or grave disobedience shown to the ecclesiastical judge who has legitimately summoned one to appear in court. In criminal cases contumacy is generally called contempt of court, and in the civil law it creates a presumption of guilt. In civil cases it is simply styled default to appear or plead in court, which follows the presumption that the plaintiff has renounced the right to prosecute. Contumacy may be shown by the defendant as well as by the plaintiff.

CONTUMACY OF THE DEFENDANT

CAN. 1842

Reus citatus qui sine iusta causa nec ipse per se nec per procuratorem comparet, contumax declarari potest.

CAN. 1843

§ 1. Non potest iudex reum contumacem declarare nisi prius constiterit:

1.° Citationem, legitime factam, tempore utili ad rei notitiam pervenisse aut saltem pervenire debuisse;

2.° Reum absentiae excusationem afferre neglexisse aut non iustam attulisse.

§ 2. Haec comprobari possunt sive per novam cita-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tionem reo factam ut contumaciam suam, si possit, excuset, sive alio modo.

Can. 1844

§ 1. Ad instantiam partis vel promotoris iustitiae vel vinculi defensoris, si iudicio intersint, iudex rei contumaciam declarare potest, eaque declarata, procedere, servatis servandis, usque ad sententiam definitivam eiusque exsecutionem.

§ 2. Si procedatur ad sententiam definitivam, lite non contestata, sententia respicere tantum debet petita in libello; si lite contestata, ipsum contestationis obiectum.

Can. 1845

§ 1. Sed potest quoque iudex ad frangendam rei contumaciam comminari ecclesiasticas poenas.

§ 2. Quod si facere velit, iteranda est rei citatio, cum comminatione poenarum; nec iam tunc licet aut contumaciam declarare aut, ea declarata, poenas irrogare, nisi probetur hanc quoque secundam citationem suo effectu caruisse.

1. A defendant who has been duly summoned, and does not appear in court either personally or by proxy, may be declared to be in contempt: (a) if the summons, as described in can. 1711 ff., was lawfully issued and reached or at least might have reached the defendant within a reasonable time; (b) if the defendant failed to excuse himself, or offered no legitimate reason for his non-appearance in court.

To prove contumacy, a second summons may be issued, in order to give the defendant time to excuse his non-appearance. But if the judge deems it more expedient,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

another course may be taken. If two witnesses testify that the summons was duly served and received by the defendant, the judge may proceed as stated in can. 1844, because in that case he is certain of his ground and he who is certain need not strive for greater certainty.[1] But if he issues a new summons, a term must be set for appearance, and only after this term has expired, may contumacy be declared.[2]

2. But the necessary declaration may also be made upon the demand of the other party, or of the fiscal promotor or defender, if present at the trial. As soon as contumacy has been declared, the judge may proceed to the final sentence and its execution, provided he observes the rest of the rules prescribed (servatis servandis). This means that the proceeding is regular and conducted along the general rules governing trials, with the sole omission of the parts which the defendant would play if he were present; therefore the interrogatories, the confrontation, and the self-defence are omitted; but the controversial points should be communicated to the defendant if he can be reached.[3]

If no contestatio litis has as yet taken place, the sentence can only be directed to the object or petition contained in the bill of complaint; i.e., only so much can be granted as was asked for in the petition offered to the judge, and no more. On the other hand, if contumacy has been declared after the issue in pleading, the sentence shall cover all that the plaintiff pleaded for and the defendant denied, because the latter is supposed to have been present at that moment.

Can. 1845 permits the threat of ecclesiastical penalties in order to force a stubborn recusant or contumax to be

1 Reg. juris 31 in 6°.
2 Regulae S. R. R., Aug. 4, 1910, § 26 (A. Ap. S. II, 792).
3 Reg. S. RR., Aug. 4, 1910, § 126, n. 6 (A. Ap. S., II, 793).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

obedient, not merely, as the Tridentine Council admitted,[4] in order to make him accept the sentence and its execution. But if the judge wishes to make use of this juridico-ecclesiastical weapon, he must issue a second summons in which this threat is directly mentioned. However, even after the second summons, contumacy may be declared and the penalty inflicted only when proof has been given that this second summons, like the first, was ineffective or unheeded. The proof can be furnished as stated above, or by public courier.

DESISTING FROM CONTUMACY

CAN. 1846

Rei a contumacia recedentis seque in iudicio sistentis ante causae definitionem, conclusiones probationesque, si quas afferat, admittantur; caveat autem iudex ne mala fide in longiores et non necessarias moras iudicium protrahatur.

CAN. 1847

Post latam vero sententiam, contumax beneficium restitutionis in integrum ad appellandum ab ipso iudice qui eam tulit, petere potest, non ultra tamen trimestre ab ipsius sententiae intimatione, nisi agatur de causis quae non transeunt in rem iudicatam.

CAN. 1848

Regulis superius traditis etiam tum locus est cum reus, etsi primae citationi obtemperaverit, fit tamen postea, progressu iudicii, contumax.

4 Sess. 15, c. 3, de ref.; Messmer, p. 137.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

If the contumacious defendant appears in court before the final sentence, his claims and proofs, if he has any, must be admitted; but the judge must assure himself that the defendant's motive in postponing his appearance was not to prolong the trial unnecessarily, or to wear out the judge and the plaintiff.

If the defendant appears in court after the final sentence has been given in his case, the only mode of appeal open to him is by restitutio in integrum, which he must ask for within three months from the date of the sentence. A longer term is admissible only in matters which never become res iudicatae, as, for instance, matrimonial cases.

The rules so far laid down also hold in case the defendant, after having obeyed the first summons, becomes contumacious in the course of the trial.

CONTUMACY OF THE PLAINTIFF

CAN. 1849

Si die et hora, qua reus secundum citationis praescriptum coram iudice primum se sistit, actor non adsit, nullamque vel insufficientem absentiae excusationem attulerit, iudex eum ad instantiam rei conventi citet iterum; et si actor novae citationi non paruerit vel postea iudicium inchoare vel inchoatum prosequi neglexerit, instante reo convento vel promotore iustitiae aut defensore vinculi, contumax a iudice declaretur, iisdem servatis regulis quae supra traditae sunt pro rei contumacia.

The Code has combined two apparently contradictory Decretals[5] in such a way that no collision is possible.

[5] C. 3, X, II, 14; c. 1, 6°, II, 6.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Suppose the summons was duly issued and the defendant appears in court on the appointed day and hour, but the plaintiff demurs. This seems to be a grievous offence, because it was the plaintiff who caused the summons to be issued and who is bound to prosecute the case. Therefore it might naturally be expected that the judge would be stricter in case of contumacy towards the plaintiff than towards the defendant, and a second summons would be regarded as unnecessary.[6] But the Code leans towards a more equitable treatment and orders another summons to be issued, even if the defendant demands it, and the plaintiff had no excuse, or at least no sufficient reason, for not appearing in court. And if this second summons is unheeded by the plaintiff, or if he does not begin or pursue his case in court, he is declared in contempt, provided either the defendant or the fiscal promoter or defender insist upon such a declaration. For the rest, the rules laid down for the defendant in contempt cases must be applied.

EFFECT OF CONTUMACY

CAN. 1850

§ 1. Actoris contumacia a iudice declarata perimit eiusdem actoris ius ad suam instantiam prosequendam.

§ 2. Permittitur tamen promotori iustitiae vel vinculi defensori instantiam facere suam eamque prosequi, quoties publicum bonum id postulare videatur.

§ 3. Reus autem exinde ius habet petendi ut vel libere possit a iudicio abire, vel nulla habeantur omnia eo usque gesta, vel definitive ipse absolvatur a petitione

6 Thus in c. 1, 6°, II, 6, whilst c. 3, X, II, 14 seems to admit omission of summons to plaintiff; see Santi-Leitner, II, 14, n. 6 f.; Lega, l. c., n. 436.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

actoris, vel iudicium, absente quoque actore, ad finem adducatur.

CAN. 1851

§ 1. Qui contumax declaratus contumaciam suam non purgaverit, sive actor sit sive reus, condemnetur tum ad litis expensas, quae ob suam contumaciam factae sunt, tum etiam, si opus sit, ad indemnitatem alteri parti praestandam.

§ 2. Si tum actor tum reus sint contumaces, ad expensas litis tenentur in solidum.

If the plaintiff has been declared contumacious, he forfeits the right of prosecuting the case, because he is supposed to have renounced that right. However, if the case concerns the public welfare, as, for instance, in criminal, ordinational, and matrimonial matters, either the promotor iustitiae or the defensor vinculi may continue the prosecution in his own name.

The counter effect of a declaration of contempt against the plaintiff is that the defendant may demand his discharge, or that all the proceedings so far have to be considered null and void, or that he be definitely freed from the claims of the plaintiff, or that the trial be brought to a close even during the absence of the plaintiff.

If either the plaintiff or the defendant has been declared contumax and has not purged himself of this stain, he must be condemned to bear the expenses caused by his contumacy, and if necessary, also to indemnify the other party. If both, plaintiff and defendant, have been contumacious, they are bound to defray the expenses thus far incurred in solidum, i.e., each one the whole expense if either should be insolvent or beyond reach.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

INTERVENTION OF A THIRD PERSON

CAN. 1852

§ 1. Is cuius interest, admitti potest ad interveniendum in causa in qualibet litis instantia.

§ 2. Sed ut admittatur, debet ante conclusionem in causa libellum iudici exhibere, in quo breviter de iure interveniendi ipsum edoceat.

§ 3. Qui intervenit in causa, admittendus est in eo statu in quo causa reperitur, assignato eidem brevi ac peremptorio termino ad probationes suas exhibendas, si causa ad periodum probatoriam pervenerit.

CAN. 1853

Si tertii interventus appareat necessarius, iudex ad instantiam partis vel etiam ex officio debet interventum in causa iubere.

Intervention is perhaps best known from international law, where it means interference by one state in affairs pending between two or more other states that have either gone to war or reached a degree of tension clearly threatening war. The interest of the intervening state as well as that of international society justifies such interference.[1] Similarly, not only the plaintiff and defendant, but a third person, too, may be concerned in the issue of 1 Westlake, International Law, P. I, Peace; 1910, p. 317.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

a trial, for instance, a legacy or a matrimonial case involving legitimacy.

Hence our text admits intervention by interested persons in any case and at any stage. However, in order to be admitted, the third party must, before the conclusio in causa, present a bill briefly stating the claim on which he bases his intervention. As intervention is permitted at any stage or instance of the trial, the judge who has been chosen by the plaintiff, either in the first instance or the court of appeal,[2] may take cognizance of and admit the intervention. The one who intervenes must be admitted only at the stage or instance which the trial had reached when he came in, for instance, after the litis contestatio, or at the defence of the parties, or at the conclusio in causa, or, finally, in the instance of appeal. And from that point onward the third party may be present at all the acts. But the text adds that brief and peremptory terms should be assigned to the third party for his evidence if the trial is near the point where the evidence is gathered in.

Can. 1853 mentions necessary intervention, undoubtedly to distinguish it from another, which is called voluntary. The latter is intervention spontaneously offered by a third person in order to help either of the litigants; whereas necessary intervention is commanded by the judge, either at the demand of a party, or ex officio. In the latter case the promotor iustitiae should, or at least may, be notified.[3]

2 C. 38, X, II, 20; cfr. Wernz, l. c., V, n. 177 f., p. 156 f.

3 Regulae S. R. R. Aug. 4, 1910, § 97, n. 2 (A. Ap. S., II, 815).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER III

ATTEMPTS PENDING THE TRIAL

CAN. 1854

Attentatum est quidquid, lite pendente, aut altera pars adversus alteram aut ipse iudex adversus alterutram vel utramque partem innovat, parte dissentiente et in eius praeiudicium; sive innovatio respiciat litis materiam, salvo tamen praescripto can. 1672, 1673, sive respiciat terminos partibus a iure vel a iudice assignatos ad ponendos certos actus iudiciales.

CAN. 1855

§ 1. Attentata sunt ipso iure nulla.

§ 2. Idcirco parti ex attentato laesae competit actio ad obtinendam declarationem nullitatis.

§ 3. Actio haec instituenda est coram ipso iudice causae principalis; quod si ob attentatum pars laesa iudicem suspectum habeat, exceptionem suspicionis potest opponere, in qua procedendum est ad norman can. 1615.

CAN. 1856

§ 1. Pendente quaestione de attentato, cursus causae principalis regulariter suspenditur, sed si iudici opportunius videatur, quaestio de attentato potest una cum causa principali pertractari et resolvi.

§ 2. Quaestiones de attentatis expeditissime sunt per-tractandae et decreto iudicis definiendae, auditis partibus et promotore iustitiae vel defensore vinculi, si hi iudicio intersint.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CAN. 1857

§ 1. Demonstrato attentato, iudex decernere debet eius revocationem seu purgationem.

§ 2. Quod si attentatum vi vel dolo patratum sit, qui illud commisit, tenetur etiam de damnis erga partem laesam.

The trial, according to can. 1725, 5°, becomes pending after the summons has been duly served or the parties have appeared in court of their own accord. The object of the quarrel is then litigious (res litigiosa),[1] and any change of, or any act against, that object is called an attempt (attentatum), provided it is prejudicial or detrimental to one of the parties concerned.[2]

It is also called an innovation because it alters the judicial status of the object. Every "attempt" is against the inhibition of the law (inhibitio iuris), because, as stated above, the Code forbids any innovation while the trial is pending. To this general inhibition must also be referred the terms set up by law, as, for instance, for appeals, in can. 1634.

The judge himself may fix definite terms for certain judicial acts, for instance, for the experts (can. 1799, § 2). These are inhibitiones hominis or iudicis.[3] Hence our Code calls an attentatum whatever savors of innovation attempted by one party against the other, or by the judge against one or both parties, provided it is made (a) pending the trial, (b) against the will of the other

1 C. 50, C. 11, q. 1.
2 C. 3, X, II, 16.
3 Lega, l. c., n. 429.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

party, and (c) to the detriment or prejudice of the other party.

The object of an innovation may be:

a) the subject of the trial (materia litis), or

b) the terms assigned either by law or by the judge.

The object may concern real as well as personal action. Thus innovatio is forbidden in matrimonial cases which are pending on the score of a diriment impediment, and the parties must not be separated, or be denied their marital rights until the case is settled.

However, this applies only to the court decision; the party who is absolutely certain of the existence of a diriment impediment would not be allowed either to ask for, or render, the debitum.[4] Other litigious matter which may occur in ecclesiastical courts are church property, benefices, and provisions or appointments. The Code makes an exception from can. 1672 f., which refer to sequestration of a litigious object and bailment or security, as these are not considered attempts, being permitted by law.

The effect, negative and positive, is stated in canon 1855, which decides (thereby settling a controversy) that all attempts are null and void ipso iure, and not merely rescindible.[5]

However, the term ipso iure is to some extent modified; for the injured party is granted the right to a legal action in order to obtain a declaration of nullity of the attempt. Therefore, if the party should take no action with regard to the attempt, we hardly believe that the judge would have to interfere. At least there is no hint that the judge

4 Reiffenstuel, II, 16, n. 11 f. The reader of Vol. V of our Comm., p. 327, line 10 from below, will please change the word certain into uncertain, the former being a misprint.

5 Concerning alienation of a litigious matter the authors were not agreed; some held that it was rescindible only. Reiffenstuel, II, 16, n. 20; Lega, l. c., n. 430.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

would have to proceed ex officio. On the other hand, it would hardly be advisable for the judge not to proceed ex officio in beneficiary cases, on account of can. 1447.

The action against attempts must be brought before the judge who is competent in regard to the main issue. However, if exception should be taken to the judge, because of suspicion, this must first be solved according to can. 1615.

Another effect of the attentatum is mentioned in can. 1856, which is modelled upon the civil code issued for the Papal States by Gregory XVI.[6] It says that the course of the main trial is, as a rule, suspended, unless the judge deems it expedient to treat and solve the incidental question concerning the attempt together with the main issue.

At any rate questions of attempt should be treated and settled as quickly as possible by a decree of the judge, who shall for this purpose hear the parties and also the fiscal promoter and the defender if they are present.

If the attempt has been proved, the judge must decree its revocation or purgation, which consists in the rescinding of all acts that have been performed during the inhibition, either of law or of the judge, with regard to this one incidental question.[7] Besides, if the attempt was made by violence or fraud, the perpetrators are bound to indemnify the injured party to an amount corresponding with the period beginning at the time when the action was brought up to the moment of its settlement.[8] This indemnification includes expenses as well as the revenues received or gain made during this time.

6 Regolamento legislativo e giudiziario per gli affari civili, Nov. 10, 1834, art. 880, 884, 886.

7 Ibid., art. 881; cfr. c. 4, X, II, 13.

8 C. 2, X, II, 14; c. 1, X, II, 17; Lega, l. c., n. 433.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XII

PUBLICATION OF THE PROCESS, CLOSING OF THE EVIDENCE, PLEADING OF THE CASE

After all the incidental questions have been settled, or, if no such questions arose, after all the evidence has been produced, the pleading proper or defence might commence, were it not for two acts, one of which requires a formal decree. They are the publication of the process and the closing of the evidence.

THE PUBLICATION OF THE PROCESS

CAN. 1858

Ante causae discussionem et sententiam omnes probationes quae sunt in actis et quae adhuc secretae permanserunt, sunt publicandae.

CAN. 1859

Concessa partibus earumque advocatis facultate acta processualia inspiciendi petendique eorum exemplar, intelligitur facta publicatio processus.

Before the defence is put up and the sentence is pronounced, all the evidence contained in the acts or records (minutes) and that which has so far been kept secret, must be published. This is done in order to give an opportunity to the parties to defend themselves. Therefore they or their attorneys are permitted to inspect the acts of the process thus far conducted, and to obtain a copy thereof. This grant is called publication of the process (publicatio processus), but it is not required for the validity of the trial, nor does it necessitate a formal decree of the judge.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CLOSING OF THE EVIDENCE

CAN. 1860

§ 1. Expletis omnibus quae ad probationes producendas pertinent, ad conclusionem in causa deveniendum est.

§ 2. Haec conclusio habetur quoties aut partes a iudice interrogatae declarent se nihil aliud deducendum habere, aut utile proponendis probationibus tempus a iudice praestitutum elapsum sit, aut iudex declaret se satis instructam causam habere.

§ 3. De peracta conclusione in causa, quocunque modo ea acciderit, iudex decretum ferat.

CAN. 1861

§ 1. Post conclusionem in causa novae probationes inhibentur, nisi agatur de causis quae nunquam transeunt in rem iudicatam aut de documentis nunc primum repertis, aut de testibus qui antea ob legitimum impedimentum tempore utili induci non potuerunt.

§ 2. Si novas probationes admittendas censeat, id decernat iudex, audita altera parte, cui congruum tempus concedat ut novas probationes cognoscere et se defendere possit; aliter iudicium nullius est momenti.

The so-called conclusio in causa is nothing else but a formal declaration that the evidence is exhausted. It requires a decree of the judge, which may be brought about in three ways: (a) The judge may ask the parties to declare that they have no further evidence to produce, or (b) the term fixed by the judge for producing evidence may have expired, or (c) the judge may declare himself to be sufficiently informed.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The conclusio in causa, as a rule, forbids the bringing forth of new evidence; otherwise there might be no limit to the trial and the door would be opened to undue protraction. However, there are cases which admit exceptions, to wit:

1.° when the matter is such that it can never become res iudicata, as in matrimonial cases;

2.° when new documents have come to light;

3.° when witnesses are lawfully prevented from giving testimony within the term assigned.

In all these cases the judge must deliberate whether the new evidence is to be admitted or not, and if he decides to admit it, he must issue a decree to that effect, after having heard the other party, viz., the one who has not produced new evidence. This same party must then, under penalty of nullity of the trial, be given sufficient time to take cognizance of the new evidence and to prepare his defence.

DEFENCE OR DISCUSSION OF THE CASE

CAN. 1862

§ 1. Facta conclusione in causa, iudex, pro suo prudenti arbitrio, partibus congruum temporis spatium praestituat ad defensiones suas seu allegationes sive per se sive per advocatum exhibendas.

§ 2. Hic terminus prorogari a iudice potest instante una parte, audita altera; vel etiam coarctari, utraque consentiente.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1863

§ 1. Defensio in scriptis est conficienda, et regulariter tot exemplaribus conscribenda quot sunt iudices, ut singula singulis iudicibus possint exemplaria distribui.

§ 2. Sed etiam promotori iustitiae et defensori vinculi, si iudicio intersint, debet exemplar tradi; praeterea partes inter se exemplaria commutare debent.

§ 3. Tribunalis praeses, quoties pro suo prudenti arbitrio necessarium censeat, et sine nimio partium gravamine fieri animadvertat, mandare potest ut defensio typis imprimatur una cum documentis principalibus in fasciculo coniungendis, qui actorum et documentorum summarium continet.

§ 4. Quo in casu iubeat ne quidquam imprimatur, nisi prius exhibito manuscripto et venia illud publicandi obtenta; praeterea sedulo caveat de secreto, si quod sit in causa servandum.

CAN. 1864

Iudicis et in tribunali collegiali praesidis est moderari, pro sua prudentia, nimiam defensionum extensionem, nisi de hoc peculiari tribunalis lege sit cautum.

CAN. 1865

§ 1. Communicatis vicissim inter partes defensionum scripturis, utrique parti responsiones exhibere liceat, intra breve tempus a iudice praestitutum, et servatis regulis et cautelis de quibus in can. 1863, 1864.

§ 2. Hoc ius partibus semel tantum esto, nisi iudici gravi ex causa iterum videatur concedendum; tunc autem concessio, uni parti facta, alteri quoque data censeatur.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CAN. 1866

§ 1. Informationes, uti vocant, orales, quibus videlicet advocati iudicem de adiunctis iuris et facti causam respicientibus instruere satagunt, prohibentur.

§ 2. Admittitur tamen moderata disputatio coram iudice pro tribunali sedente ad aliquid illustrandum, si, alterutra vel utraque parte postulante, iudex eam utilem censeat atque admittat.

§ 3. Ad disputationem obtinendam partes exhibere debent in scriptis quaestionum capita cum altera parte discutienda, paucis verbis expressa; iudicis autem est ea cum partibus hinc inde communicare, ac diem et horam disputationi assignare et disputationem ipsam moderari.

§ 4. Disputationi assistat unus ex notariis tribunalis ad hoc ut, si iudex praecipiat aut pars postulet et iudex consentiat, possit de disceptatis, confessis aut conclusis, scripto ad tramitem iuris ex continenti referre.

CAN. 1867

In causis contentiosis, si partes parare sibi tempore utili defensionem negligant, aut se remittant iudicis scientiae et conscientiae, iudex, si ex actis et probatis rem habeat plane perspectam, poterit statim sententiam pronuntiare.

The law laid down in these canons is entirely modern, based on the practice of the S. Rom. Rota,[1] and it would be vain to look for precedents in the Decretals.

The chief points with regard to the defence are:

1 Lex Propria S. R. R., June 29, 1908, can. 25 ff.; Regulae Servandae, Aug. 4, 1910, § 44 ff. (A. Ap. S., I, 26 f.; II, 799 ff.); some old canonists mention "de allegationibus"; see Wernz, V, n. 661 p. 498.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1.° A time is to be fixed by the judge for the defence, and it may be prolonged or restricted.

2.° The defence is to be made in writing, and if so demanded by the judge,— who also gives the permission, — it must be printed. Each judge as well as the fiscal promoter and the defender is entitled to a copy, and the parties must exchange their defence.

3.° The judge or the president of the board of judges shall direct the defence so that it may not be unduly protracted.

4.° After the parties have exchanged their written defence, they shall prepare the answers within the time assigned by the judge. But answers are allowed only once, unless for weighty reasons the judge grants a second chance for pleading. However, both parties must be treated equally, i.e., if one party is allowed a second pleading, the other must be offered the same opportunity.

The answers are to be in writing and, according to the practice of the S. R. Rota, should be ready twenty days after the written or printed defence has been distributed and exchanged.[2]

5.° Whilst oral information (by which attorneys try to explain circumstances of law and fact to the judge, who may thus be unduly influenced by a one-sided presentation of the case) is forbidden, a moderate oral discussion or pleading is permitted, if necessary to throw light on the subject. However, it is required:

a) That this pleading be made before the court, that it be requested by one or both of the parties, and that the judge give his consent or deem it useful;

b) That the permission be given only after the points

2 Lex Propria S. R. R., c. 27, n. 3; Regulae S. R. R., Aug. 4, 1910, § 50 (A. Ap. S., I, 27; II, 801).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to be discussed have been briefly stated by the parties in writing;

c) That the judge communicate these points to both parties;

d) That he set the day and hour for the discussion of them and direct the discussion himself;

e) That a notary immediately take down the minutes of the discussion, including admissions and conclusions, as often as the judge commands or either party, with the consent of the judge, demands it.

6.° In private civil matters, if the parties do not present their defence within the time prescribed, or commit their case to the knowledge and conscience of the judge, the latter may immediately pronounce sentence, provided the acts and the evidence are so plain as to permit him to do so.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XIII

THE SENTENCE

After the pleading is ended by the defence, either because nothing more can be said or because the judge deems the evidence sufficient, the sentence must be pronounced. The Code first defines the sentence, then states the rules to be followed by the judge, and, finally, defines the contents of the sentence and prescribes the manner of its publication.

DEFINITION AND INTRINSIC CONDITIONS OF THE SENTENCE

CAN. 1868

§ 1. Legitima pronuntiatio qua iudex causam a litigantibus propositam et iudiciali modo pertractatam definit, sententia est: eaque interlocutoria dicitur, si dirimat incidentem causam; definitiva, si principalem.

§ 2. Ceterae iudicis pronuntiationes decreta vocantur.

CAN. 1869

§ 1. Ad pronuntiationem cuiuslibet sententiae requiritur in iudicis animo moralis certitudo circa rem sententia definiendam.

§ 2. Hanc certitudinem iudex haurire debet ex actis et probatis.

§ 3. Probationes autem aestimare iudex debet ex sua

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

conscientia, nisi lex aliquid expresse statuat de efficacia alicuius probationis.

§ 4. Iudex qui eam certitudinem efformare sibi non potuit, pronuntiet non constare de iure actoris et reum dimittat, nisi agatur de causa favorabili, quo in casu pro ipsa pronuntiandum est, et salvo praescripto can. 1697, § 2.

CAN. 1870

Sententia ferri a iudice debet, expleta causae disceptatione; et si causa sit implicatior et contentionum vel documentorum mole difficilior, interponi potest congruum temporis intervallum.

1. A sentence is the legitimate pronouncement of a judge, by which a case proposed by the litigants and judicially tried, is settled. It is called interlocutory if it settles an incidental question, definitive if it settles the main issue. All other settlements or pronunciamentos of the judge are called decrees.[1]

2. The intrinsic requisites for a sentence are the following:

a) The judge must have moral certitude concerning the case he settles by his sentence. Moral certitude requires sufficient proof to convince the judge of the righteousness of the cause.

b) The proofs may not be sought outside of the acts and allegations of the trial (acta et probata), because it is not as a private citizen, but as a judge, that he must give sentence. Hence privately gained knowledge should not influence the decision.[2]

1 See Appendix, pp. 485 sqq.

2 A theological question here arises: Is the judge so bound by the acta et probata that he would have to decide against his own private conscience. Three opinions are proposed; the first simply affirms, the second flatly denies, and the third, which to us appears more probable, distinguishes: in civil (to

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

c) Yet the judge must weigh the evidence according to his own conscience. He must know the law and acquaint himself fully with the evidence. The rule is that all other things being equal or the testimony being equally strong on both sides, the decision should be in favor of the possesser, because melior est conditio possidentis.[3] Hence our text adds the clause: unless the law itself should state something definite concerning the weight of evidence. Every sentence opposed to a clear and express law text would be ipso iure null and void, for the judge has not to reverse, but to uphold the law.[4]

d) From this naturally follows the corollary set forth in can. 1869, § 4: If no certainty can be had, the judge must pronounce in favor of the defendant and dismiss him; unless the case is one of possession or contains or turns about a favor, in which hypothesis, although the law is more favorable to absolution or freedom, the favor should be upheld.

e) The sentence must be given after the pleading has been completed. This means immediately or soon after the defence has exhausted its arguments. However, there are intricate cases, rendered so by reason of the many papers or documents that must be pondered before the judge has a clear vision of the case, and the decision of these may be delayed for a time.

which they also belong matrimonial) cases, and in minor criminal cases, the judge is obliged to decide according to the acta et probata, but not in important criminal cases; see Bouix, De Iudicis Eccl., I, p. 140.

3 Cfr. c. 27, X, II, 20; c. 3, X, II, 19.

4 C. 1, X, II, 27; c. 1, X, I, 2; c. 1, 6°, II, 14.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

HOW A BOARD OF JUDGES OR ONE JUDGE PRONOUNCES SENTENCE

CAN. 1871

§ 1. In tribunali collegiali, qua die et hora iudices ad deliberandum conveniant, collegii praeses constituat; et nisi peculiaris causa aliud suadeat, in ipsa tribunalis sede conventus habeatur.

§ 2. Assignata conventui die, singuli iudices scriptas afferent conclusiones suas in merito causae, et rationes tam in facto quam in iure, quibus ad conclusionem suam venerint: quae conclusiones actis causae adiungantur, secreto servandae.

§ 3. Prolatis ex ordine, secundum praecedentiam, ita tamen ut semper a causae ponente seu relatore initium fiat, singulorum conclusionibus, habeatur moderata discussio sub tribunalis praesidis ductu, praesertim ut constabiliatur quid statuendum sit in parte dispositiva sententiae.

§ 4. In discussione autem fas unicuique est a pristina sua conclusione recedere.

§ 5. Quod si iudices in prima discussione ad hanc sententiam devenire aut nolint aut nequeant, differri poterit decisio ad novum conventum; qui tamen ultra hebdomadam comperendinari non debet.

CAN. 1872

Si unicus sit iudex, ipsius tantum est sententiam exarare; in tribunali vero collegiali servetur praescriptum can. 1584.

1. When a board of judges has to pronounce sentence, the procedure is as follows:

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

a) The presiding officer determines the day and the hour when the judges shall meet for deliberation. The place for the meeting is the courtroom, unless circumstances make it advisable to choose another locality.

b) On the day appointed each judge shall bring with him the conclusions he has arrived at in the case together with a statement of the motives that prompt them.

All this must be done in writing and inserted in the acts of the trial, but kept secret. The reasons for his opinion or conclusions each judge must state in facto et iure. The phrase in facto means that the conclusions must remain within the writ of complaint, or concern precisely this case and no other; the reasons de iure may be applied to the law in general as well as to any specific right on which the plaintiff based his claim; this is also called in causa et actione. Hence the sentence must, as the canonists say, conform to the libellus and to the law in general.[5]

c) After the conclusions of each judge have been read by the ponens or referee, and then by the judges, according to precedence, a moderate discussion shall take place under the supervision of the presiding judge, in order to determine the dispositive part of the sentence more accurately.

d) Each judge is permitted to change his conclusion in the course of this discussion, because the discussion may convince him that he made an error, either in facto or in iure.

e) If the judges are unwilling or unable to arrive at a definite sentence, another discussion may be held, but not later than eight days after the first.

2. If but one judge is sitting in tribunal, he must work out the sentence for himself; but in a board the president may entrust one of the judges with the office of ponens, to draft the sentence in writing (can. 1584).

5 Reiffenstuel, II, 27, n. 70 ff.; Santi-Leitner, II, 27, n. 8.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CONTENTS OF THE SENTENCE

CAN. 1873

§ 1. Sententia debet:

1.° Definire controversiam coram tribunali agitatam; hoc est reum absolvere vel condemnare quod attinet ad petitiones vel accusationes adversus eum prolatas, data singulis dubiis, seu controversiae articulis, congrua responsione;

2.° Determinare (saltem quatenus fas sit et materia patiatur), quid pars damnata dare, facere, praestare, aut pati debeat, aut a quo abstinere; itemque quo modo, loco vel tempore obligatio implenda sit;

3.° Continere rationes seu motiva quae dicuntur, tam in facto quam in iure, quibus dispositiva sententiae pars innititur;

4.° Statuere de litis expensis.

§ 2. In tribunali collegiali motiva ab extensore desumantur ex iis quae singuli iudices in discussione attulerunt, nisi ab ipsa iudicum maiore parte praefinitum fuerit quaenam sint motiva proferenda.

The sentence must be drafted in such a way:

1.° That it settles the controversy at issue, that is, it must be either absolutory or condemnatory concerning the question contained in the writ of complaint (libellus), and offer suitable answers to each disputed point.

2.° That, as far as the case permits, the penalty of the guilty party is determined. Hence the sentence should clearly and precisely state what the condemned party has to give, do, perform, or from what to abstain; also the manner, place, and time for fulfilling the obligation imposed. This is called sententia certa. A conditional sentence, as a rule, is invalid,[6] because a trial is supposed to settle the quarrel.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3.° That it contain the reasons[7] in facto et iure, as stated above, upon which the dispositive part of the sentence is based. The dispositive part is that which contains the absolutory or condemnatory sentence. Hence neither the arenga, nor the narratio propria, nor the conclusio are here concerned.

4.° That it state the amount of expenses incurred. The extensor, who is no one else but the ponens or referee, i.e., one of the judges, may make a summary (ristretto) of the motives or reasons given by the judges, unless the majority has specifically determined which motives are to be advanced.

EXTRINSIC FORMALITIES

CAN. 1874

§ 1. Sententia ferri debet, divino Nomine ab initio semper invocato.

§ 2. Dein exprimat oportet ex ordine qui sit iudex aut tribunal; qui sit actor, reus, procurator, nominibus et domicilio rite designatis, promotor iustitiae, defensor vinculi, si partem in iudicio habuerint.

§ 3. Referre postea debet breviter facti speciem cum partium conclusionibus.

§ 4. Hisce subsequatur pars dispositiva sententiae, praemissis rationibus quibus innititur.

§ 5. Claudatur cum indicatione diei et loci in quibus

6 Reiffenstuel, II, 27, n. 87 ff.

7 The Regulae S. R. Rotae, Aug. 4, 1910, § 182 (A. Ap. S., II, 836) state that if these reasons are not given, the sentence is invalid.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

exarata est et cum subscriptione iudicis vel omnium iudicum, si plures fuerint, et notarii.

Can. 1875

Regulae superius positae locum habent potissimum in proferenda sententia definitiva; sed applicantur etiam, quantum diversa res patitur, in proferenda interlocutoria.

1. The sentence must contain an invocation of the Divinity.[8]

2. The following names must be set down in order: the names of the judge or tribunal, i.e., the board of judges; of the plaintiff, defendant, proctor, together with their domiciles, of the fiscal promoter and the defender, provided they took part in the trial.

2. It must contain a brief statement of the case together with the arguments or conclusions of the parties.

4. Then follows the dispositive part of the sentence, preceded by a statement of the motives which prompted it.

5. At the bottom or end of all these statements follow the day and the place when and where the sentence was drafted, and the signatures of the judge or judges and the notary.

All these rules, says can. 1875, apply chiefly to definitive sentences, but they should be observed also with regard to interlocutory sentences, if the nature of the incidental question calls for or permits it.

8 Examples are plentiful in the decisions of the S. R. Rota, for instance: "Christi nomine invocato, solumque Deum prae oculis habentes," etc.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PUBLICATION OF THE SENTENCE

CAN. 1876

Sententia, hac ratione redacta, quamprimum publicetur.

CAN. 1877

Publicatio sententiae fieri potest tribus modis, vel citando partes ad audiendam sententiae lectionem sollemniter factam a iudice pro tribunali sedente; vel partibus denuntiando sententiam esse penes cancellariam tribunalis, unaque facultatem ipsis fieri eandem legendi et eiusdem exemplar petendi; vel tandem, ubi usus viget, sententiae exemplar transmittendo ad partes per publicos tabellarios ad norman can. 1719.

The sentence thus drafted should be published as soon as possible. How soon, is not expressly stated; but the phrase generally means after an interval of not more than three or eight days.

The manner in which the sentence may be published is threefold:

1. By summoning the parties to hear the sentence solemnly pronounced by the judge sitting[9] in court;

2. By notifying the parties that the sentence is ready at the chancery of the court and leave is granted to read it and have a copy made;

3. By sending a copy of the sentence to the parties through the public carrier, where this is customary.

[9] Whether this attitude of sitting is required for the validity of the sentence cannot positively be proved from the text, especially since a threefold mode of publication is admitted; therefore we would rather say that it belongs to the decorum or dignity of the judge to observe a sitting posture.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XIV

LEGAL REDRESS AGAINST THE SENTENCE

CAN. 1878

§ 1. Si agatur de errore materiali qui inciderit vel in transcribenda parte dispositiva sententiae vel in referendis factis aut partium petitionibus aut in ponendis calculis, errorem corrigere valet ipse iudex.

§ 2. Iudex ad hanc correctionem deveniat edito decreto ad instantiam partis, nisi pars altera refragetur.

§ 3. Si altera pars refragetur, quaestio, incidens ad normam can. 1840, § 3 decreto definiatur; et decretum ad calcem sententiae correctae referatur.

After the sentence has been pronounced, execution should follow. However the party condemned may find it too hard or unjust and therefore claim a gravamen. This would justify an appeal. But before the Code treats of appeals, it considers the possibility of a merely material error, which may have crept into the copy of the dispositive part of the sentence. A mistake may also have been made in the narration of facts, or in the writ of complaint, or in the reckoning of accounts. Such an error should be corrected by the judge himself, who shall issue a decree to that effect upon demand of one party, provided the other is satisfied. But if the other party refuses to accept the correction, the question must be treated as an incidental one, summarily disposed of according to can. 1840, § 3, and notice be given at the bottom of the sentence thus corrected.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER I

APPEALS

CAN. 1879

Pars quae aliqua sententia se gravatam putat, itemque promotor iustitiae et defensor vinculi in causis in quibus interfuerunt, ius habent a sententia appellandi, idest provocandi ab inferiore iudice qui sententiam tulit, ad superiorem, salvo praescripto can. 1880.

Appeal is here taken in the strictly judicial sense, requiring a preceding judicial sentence. Hence it is a complaint brought from an inferior judge, who pronounced a sentence, to a higher judge. The intention or purpose is to seek redress. This, of course, chiefly concerns the party who believes himself injured or hurt by the former sentence.

But the promotor iustitiae, too, as well as the defensor vinculi, may have a just complaint against the former sentence, not indeed personally, but officially, because they are under the impression that the public welfare has been injured. These, too, therefore, may appeal. As a rule, an appeal is permissible in all cases of grievance, except those expressly exempted by law.

WHEN AN APPEAL IS FORBIDDEN

CAN. 1880

Non est locus appellationi:

1.° A sententia ipsius Summi Pontificis vel Signaturae Apostolicae;

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2.° A sententia iudicis qui a Sancta Sede delegatus est ad videndam causam cum clausula "appellatione remota";

3.° A sententia vitio nullitatis infecta;

4.° A sententia quae in rem iudicatam transiit;

5.° A definitiva quae iureiurando litis decisorio innixa est;

6.° A iudicis decreto vel a sententia interlocutoria, quae non habeat vim definitivae, nisi cumuletur cum appellatione a sententia definitiva;

7.° A sententia in causa pro qua ius cavet expeditissime rem esse definiendam;

8.° A sententia contra contumacem, qui a contumacia se non purgaverit;

9.° A sententia lata contra eum qui in scriptis expresse professus est se appellationi renuntiare.

The Code forbids appeal in nine cases, two of which affect the person of the judge, one (n. 3) the form of the sentence, and the rest its matter. An appeal is inadmissible, therefore,

1.° From a sentence of the Supreme Pontiff or the Signatura Apostolica. The Roman Pontiff is the highest judge of the universal Church, and therefore an appeal from his sentence is impossible. Appeal from the Signatura Apostolica is impossible because of its office and power.[2] An appeal in the proper sense is inadmissible also from a sentence of any of the Roman Congregations, which, however, decide, not judiciary but disciplinary matters, and hence are not especially mentioned.[3]

2.° From the sentence of a judge who took cognizance of the case in virtue of papal delegation with the clause,

2 Cfr. can. 259; can. 1603. 3 Santi-Leitner, II, 28, n. 6.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

"appellatione remota." For this clause forbids an appeal.

In these two cases only one remedy is open, namely, the restitutio in integrum (see can. 1905–1907).

Here may be mentioned the penalty incurred by those who appeal from a sentence of the Roman Pontiff to a general council: it is excommunication speciali modo reserved to the Holy See.[4]

3.° From a sentence which is null and void, as may be seen in can. 1892 f.; because an invalid sentence is no sentence at all, and an appeal always presupposes a valid sentence.

4.° From a sentence which has passed into a res iudicata, as seen in can. 1902 f., unless the sentence has been executed with excessive rigor.[5]

5.° From a definitive sentence which has been pronounced in virtue of a decisive oath, because of the sacredness of the oath and on account of a species of contract.[6]

6.° From a decree or interlocutory sentence of the judge, which is not definitive, unless coupled with an appeal from a definitive sentence, when an appeal is permitted by reason of the connection. Otherwise not, ne procedatur in infinitum.

7.° From a sentence pronounced in a matter for which the law provides a speedy settlement, as against non-resident clerics,[7] or in case of appointment to offices.

8.° From a sentence against a contumacious person who has not purged himself of his contumacy, according to can. 1842 ff. ("quia contumax non appellat.")[8]

9.° From a sentence pronounced against one who has

4 Cfr. can. 2332.
5 Cfr. c. 15, X, II, 27; c. 33, X, II, 28.
6 Cfr. c. 54, X, II, 28; c. 20, X, I, 29; Santi-Leitner, II, 28, n. 12.
7 C. 4, X, III, 4.
8 Reiffenstuel, II, 28, n. 303.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

given a written declaration that he will not appeal, because this declaration is equal to a contract.[9]

With these exceptions, appeals are admitted in every case, whether important or insignificant. But there are certain formalities to be observed regarding the judges from, and those to whom, an appeal is made.

THE JUDGE A QUO

CAN. 1881

Appellatio interponi debet coram iudice a quo sententia prolata est intra decem dies a notitia publicationis sententiae.

CAN. 1882

§ 1. Appellatio fieri potest oretenus coram iudice pro tribunali sedente, si publice sententia legatur, statimque ab actuario scriptis redigenda est.

§ 2. Aliter facienda est in scriptis, salvo casu de quo in can. 1707.

An appeal must be brought before the judge who pronounced the sentence, within ten days from the time the sentence became known. If the judge is still sitting in court, and the sentence was publicly read, the appeal may be made there and then; but the clerk must put it down in writing. Otherwise the party may, within ten days, put in the appeal in writing and offer it to the judge; or employ a notary public (of the ecclesiastical court) to draw it up for him. A notary public is also required if the appeal is made orally before the judge, because then the judge shall order the notary to put it down in writing. But the appeal must by all means be presented to the judge who passed the sentence, otherwise it is invalid.[10]

[9] Cfr. c. 54, X, II, 28; c. 25, X, II, 24.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

THE JUDGE AD QUEM

CAN. 1883

Appellatio prosequenda est coram iudice ad quem dirigitur intra mensem ab eius interpositione, nisi iudex a quo longius tempus ad eam prosequendam parti praestituerit.

CAN. 1884

§ 1. Ad prosequendam appellationem requiritur et sufficit ut pars ministerium invocet iudicis superioris ad impugnatae sententiae emendationem, adiuncto exemplari huius sententiae et libelli appellatorii quem iudici inferiori exhibuerat.

§ 2. Quod si pars exemplar impugnatae sententiae intra utile tempus a tribunali a quo obtinere nequeat, interim termini non decurrunt et impedimentum significandum est iudici appellationis, qui iudicem a quo praecepto obstringat officio suo quamprimum satisfaciendi.

CAN. 1885

§ 1. Si casus de quo in can. 1733 contigerit intra terminum ad appellandum utilem sed antequam appellatio interposita sit, sententia debet iis quorum interest denuntiari eisque concessi intelliguntur termini a iure statuti a die denuntiationis computandi.

§2. Si contigerit postquam fuerit appellatum, appellatio interposita eisdem denuntietur, in quorum fa-

10 C. 59, X, II, 28.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

vorem a die denuntiationis denuo currere incipit tempus utile ad appellationem prosequendam.

The appeal must be prosecuted before the judge to whom it was directed, within a month from the date when it was lodged.

But the judge from whom the appeal was made, may fix a longer term for the prosecution of the case appealed. The judge ad quem is not determined here, but the rule is that he should be the one immediately superior. Hence from the diocesan court appeal should be taken to the metropolitan court. However, this latter may lawfully be omitted if an appeal is addressed to Rome. From the vicar general to the bishop no appeal is possible.[11]

In order to prosecute the appeal it is required and suffices that the higher court be implored to change the obnoxious sentence. A copy of the first sentence and the writ of appeal presented to the inferior court must be sent to the higher court. In case the party cannot obtain a copy of the sentence from the judge a quo, the time "does not run," i.e., the lapse of one month must not be reckoned as fatal. But the obstacle must be reported to the court of appeal, who shall send peremptory notice to the lower court, admonishing it of its duty. If the appellant should die, or change his personal status, or go out of office (see can. 1733) within the term (of ten days) granted for putting in the appeal, but before the appeal was actually made, the sentence must be notified to those concerned, and the term for appeal runs from the day of the notice. If the case, as stated above, occurs after the appeal has already been made, the appeal must be made known to the parties concerned, and the 11 Cfr. cc. 4, 6, C. 2, q. 6; c. 1, 6°, I, 4: the vicar general and the bishop form one tribunal.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google term (of ten days) runs from the days of the notice given (and, we suppose, received).

LAPSE OF TERM

CAN. 1886

Inutiliter elapsis fatalibus appellatoriis sive coram iudice a quo, sive coram iudice ad quem, deserta censetur appellatio.

If the parties permit the term granted for appeal (i.e., ten days for putting in the appeal before the judge a quo, and a month or thirty days for prosecuting the appeal before the appellate court), to expire, the appeal is supposed to have been dropped. These terms are called fatalia, because they prove fatal to a cause if not observed.[12]

EFFECT OF APPEALS

CAN. 1887

§ 1. Appellatio facta ab actore prodest etiam reo, et vicissim.

§ 2. Si interponatur ab una parte super aliquo sententiae capite, pars adversa, etsi fatalia appellationis fuerint transacta, potest super aliis capitibus incidenter appellare; idque facere potest etiam sub conditione recedendi, si prior pars ab instantia recesserit.

§ 3. Si sententia plura capita contineat, et appellans quaedam tantummodo capita impugnet, cetera capita exclusa habeantur; si nullum determinavit caput, appellatio praesumitur facta contra omnia capita.

12 Cfr. c. 28, C. 2, q. 6; c. 2, Clem. II, 12.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1888

Si unus ex pluribus correis aut actoribus sententiam impugnet, impugnatio censetur ab omnibus facta, quoties res petita sit individua aut obligatio solidalis; expensas vero iudiciales ille tantum sustinere debet qui appellavit, si iudex appellationis primam sententiam confirmaverit.

CAN. 1889

§ 1. Appellatio in suspensivo exsecutionem appellatae sententiae suspendit ac propterea in suo robore permanet principium: "lite pendente nihil innovetur": appellatio autem in devolutivo tantum, non suspendit exsecutionem sententiae, licet lis adhuc pendeat circa meritum causae.

§ 2. Omnis appellatio est in suspensivo, nisi aliud in iure expresse caveatur, firmo praescripto can. 1917, § 2.

Since the cause binds plaintiff and defendant, the right of appeal benefits both. Thus, if one party appeals within the proper time concerning one point of the sentence, say in a possessory cause, the other may appeal on another point of the same sentence, say in a petitory cause, even after the lapse of the "fatal" time. And this may be done conditionally, e.g., if John recedes from his appeal, Joseph shall also withdraw. The writ of appeal shall state precisely what is intended. If no special point is mentioned, the appeal is supposed to be directed against the entire sentence. Therefore, if only one article of the sentence is attacked, this fact must be properly stated in the writ.

It may also be that there are several plaintiffs or defendants who oppose the sentence. In this case the appeal is supposed to be made by all, provided the litigious object is indivisible or the obligation binds in solidum. But the expenses are to be borne by the one who appealed, provided the second sentence ratifies the first.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The proper effect of an appeal is twofold, viz., suspensive or devolutive. The suspensive effect of an appeal consists in stopping the execution of the sentence or suspending its effect. It is, therefore, not a quashing of the sentence, but merely a putting off. Hence whatever is attempted against or during a suspensive appeal, is revocable and considered as attentatum, wherefore the axiom must be applied: "Lite pendente nihil innovetur." The regular or usual effect of each and every appeal is suspensive, unless the law states the contrary, and with due regard to can. 1917, § 2.

The devolutive effect of an appeal consists in this, that the superior judge draws the whole case before his court and first decides whether or not the appeal is to be admitted, but the sentence takes effect or is carried out, even though the merit of the issue is still pending. An example may be taken from the division of parishes.[18]

SECOND INSTANCE OR COURT OF APPEAL

CAN. 1890

Interposita appellatione tribunal a quo debet ad iudicem ad quem actorum causae authenticum exemplar vel ipsamet originalia acta causae transmittere ad norman can. 1644.

18 For cases in devolutivo see canons 345; 513, § 2; 1340, § 3; 1395; 1428, § 3; 2243, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1891

§ 1. In gradu appellationis non potest admitti nova petendi causa, ne per modum quidem utilis cumulationis; ideoque litis contestatio in eo tantum versari potest ut prior sententia vel confirmetur, vel reformetur sive ex toto sive ex parte.

§ 2. Sed novis exhibitis documentis et novis probationibus poterit causa instrui, servatis regulis traditis in can. 1786, 1861.

After an appeal has been properly lodged, the court from which (a quo) the appeal was made must forward to the court of appeal (ad quem) either the original acts of the trial or a copy thereof, as stated in can. 1644.

In the second instance no new complaint or new doubts concerning the merit of the cause may be admitted, even if the new complaint were brought by way of valid bulking of several actions (utilis cumulationis).[14] Wherefore the litis contestatio, or issue in pleading at the court of appeal, consists either in the ratification or the partial or total change of the former sentence.[15] On the other hand, if new documents and new evidence have been found which for any good reason and without fraud were not available in the first instance, the case may be prepared or brought up, provided canons 1786 and 1861 are duly observed. Thus the instructor causae of the court of appeal may have to insert the new findings in the acts of the lower court.

14 Because the judge would overstep his limits as appellate judge if he were to decide an action not yet taken cognizance of by the lower court; Lega, l. c., n. 509.

15 Hence the formula: "an sententia in casu sit confirmanda an infirmanda?"

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

COMPLAINT OF NULLITY OF SENTENCE

CAN. 1892

Sententia vitio insanabilis nullitatis laborat, quando:

1.° Lata est a iudice absolute incompetente vel in tribunali collegiali a non legitimo iudicum numero contra praescriptum can. 1576, § 1;

2.° Lata est inter partes, quarum altera saltem non habet personam standi in iudicio;

3.° Quis nomine alterius egit sine legitimo mandato.

CAN. 1893

Nullitas de qua in can. 1892 proponi potest per modum exceptionis in perpetuum, per modum vero actionis coram iudice qui sententiam tulit intra triginta annos a die publicationis senteniae.

CAN. 1894

Sententia vitio sanabilis nullitatis laborat, quando:

1.° Legitima defuit citatio;

2.° Motivis seu rationibus decidendi est destituta, salvo praescripto can. 1605;

3.° Subscriptionibus caret iure praescriptis;

4.° Non refert indicationem anni, mensis, diei et loci quo prolata fuit.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1895

Querela nullitatis in casibus de quibus in can. 1894, proponi potest vel una cum appellatione intra decendium, vel seorsim et unice qua querela intra tres menses a die publicationis sententiae coram iudice qui sententiam tulit.

CAN. 1896

Si pars vereatur ne iudex, qui sententiam, querela nullitatis impugnatam, tulit, praeoccupatum animum habeat et proinde eum suspectum merito existimet, exigere potest ut alius iudex, sed in eadem iudicii sede, in eius locum subrogetur ad norman can. 1615.

CAN. 1897

§ 1. Querelam nullitatis interponere possunt nedum partes, quae se gravatas putant, sed etiam promotor iustitiae aut defensor vinculi, quoties iudicio interfuerunt.

§ 2. Imo ipse iudex potest ex officio sententiam nullam a se latam retractare et emendare intra terminos ad agendum supra statutos.

This means of redressing a grievance against a sentence was looked upon as extraordinary.[1] However we hardly believe that it could now be so called, for it has entered the list of regular remedies of redress.[2] The text distinguishes two kinds of nullity that may upset a sentence or at least retard its execution: one is a curable and the other an incurable defect.

The sentence is incurably null in the following cases:

1. When it has been rendered by an incompetent judge,

1 Lega, l. c., n. 477.

2 See can. 1905, which corroborates our opinion.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

or, if there was a board of judges, by a number less than that prescribed by law. And here it must be borne in mind and emphatically stated that according to can. 1576 three judges are required for ordination and matrimonial cases, and for some criminal cases of removal or excommunication; whilst five judges must pronounce sentence in important criminal cases of deposition and degradation.[2] The consequences involved are too serious to overlook this ruling; for a sentence in matrimonial cases may be upset by the lack of the number of judges required by law.

2. When the sentence has been pronounced on parties one of whom was not entitled to bring suit in an ecclesiastical court ("Non habet personam standi in iudicio"; see can. 1646–1654).

3. When one has prosecuted a case in another one's name without being commissioned to do so (sine legitimo mandato). Hence a proctor, counsel, or administrator (cfr. can. 1520) cannot prosecute validly without a special commission.

The mode by which a complaint of nullity may be interposed is by way of a perpetual exception, which amounts to a peremptory exception when the judge is opposed and stopped in the execution of the sentence, or the party is stopped in vindicating a sentence pronounced in his favor; or by way of action, when the judge who pronounced the sentence is petitioned to declare his own sentence null and void.[4]

A sentence has a curable defect:

1. If the legitimate summons was omitted;

2. If it does not contain the reasons or motives that prompted the judge; exempt from this rule are sentences given by the Signatura Apostolica;[5]

2 The Directory of 1920 does not prove the adoption of this necessary requisite in all American dioceses.

4 Lega, l. c., n. 510.

5 Can. 1605.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3. If the necessary signatures are wanting;

4. If the date and place are wanting; as to date, the year, month, and day are required.

Now the question naturally arises, who is the judge before whom this complaint of nullity must be lodged; for it appears that the querela nullitatis should be exclusively proposed to the judge who gave sentence (iudici a quo). First, it must be observed that a complaint against an incurable sentence can be counteracted only by way of a restitutio in integrum, according to can. 1905; because can. 1895 refers only to a sentence with a curable defect. Hence it states that a complaint against a curably defective sentence may be lodged either together with the appeal, within ten days from date of the sentence intimated,—and in this case the complaint must certainly be placed before the appellate judge—(ad quem)—or the complaint may be separately and solely brought before the judge who pronounced the sentence. For this complaint a term of three months is granted from the time the sentence was published.

If the complaint is made not by way of appeal, but separately before the judge who gave sentence, and this judge is suspected by the party of favoritism, said party may demand that another judge be substituted. However, since there is no appeal proper and the case remains in the same stage or instance, it is plain that a judge of the same instance must be substituted.

The complaint of nullity may be brought by the aggrieved parties as well as by the fiscal promoter or the defender, if they took part in the trial. The judge may ex officio retract or correct his own sentence within the time stated above, i.e., within ten days by way of appeal, or within three months in case of a complaint of nullity.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER III

INTERFERENCE OF A THIRD PERSON

CAN. 1898

Si sententiae definitivae praescriptum iura aliorum offendat, hi habent remedium extraordinarium quod oppositio tertii dicitur, vi cuius qui ex sententia suorum iurium laesionem verentur, possunt sententiam ipsam ante eius exsecutionem impugnare eique se opponere.

CAN. 1899

§ 1. Oppositio fieri potest ad recurrentis arbitrium sive postulando revisionem sententiae ab iudice qui eam tulit, sive appellando ad iudicem superiorem.

§ 2. In utroque casu oppositor probare debet ius suum revera esse laesum aut probabiliter laedendum.

§ 3. Laesio autem oriri debet ex ipsa sententia quatenus aut ipsa sit causa laesionis, aut, si exsecutioni mandetur, oppositorem gravi praeiudicio sit affectura.

§ 4. Si neutrum probetur, iudex, non obstante tertii oppositione, sententiae exsecutionem decernat.

CAN. 1900

Admissa instantia, si oppositor agere velit in gradu appellationis, tenetur legibus pro appellatione statutis; si coram ipso iudice qui sententiam tulit, regulae servandae sunt pro causis incidentibus datae.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1901

Causa ab oppositore victa, sententia antea lata mutanda est a iudice, secundum oppositoris instantiam.

If a third person believes himself injured or hurt by a judicial sentence, he may lodge a complaint and oppose the execution of the sentence. This is an extraordinary means of redressing a grievance. The opposition or interference may be brought before the court that gave the sentence and a revision demanded of the same; or by way of an appeal to a higher court. But in any case the opposer must prove that his right has been curtailed or will probably suffer damage in future. For instance, a bishop may suffer in the case of a monastery or convent which is declared dependent on another bishop.[1] But it may also happen, in the case of nullity of a marriage, because of the attendant legitimacy.

The damage may arise from the sentence itself or from its execution, as, for instance, in the case just mentioned of legitimacy. If no proof is given, the judge must issue a decree of execution of the sentence.

If the complaint is admitted and the opponent proceeds by way of appeal, the rules for appeal must be observed. If he lodges the complaint with the judge who rendered the sentence, the question must be settled as an incidental one. If the opponent wins the case, the former sentence must be changed according to the wording of the complaint lodged by the opponent.

1 C. 17, X, II, 27.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XV

RES IUDICATA AND RESTITUTIO IN INTEGRUM

A res iudicata, or adjudged matter, has the same effect as a definitive sentence, because it is supposed that no appeal was made or no complaint lodged against the sentence, and that no third person interfered or opposed the same. Besides, there are sentences against which no appeal is admitted, and which, therefore, should be carried into effect. However, there is an extraordinary means even against such a sentence, viz., the so-called restitutio in integrum.

RES IUDICATA

CAN. 1902

Res iudicata habetur:

1.° Duplici sententia conformi;

2.° Sententia intra utile tempus non appellata; aut quae, licet appellata coram iudice a quo, deserta fuit coram iudice ad quem;

3.° Sententia definitiva unica, a qua non datur appellatio ad normam can. 1880.

CAN. 1903

Nunquam transeunt in rem iudicatam causae de statu personarum; sed ex duplici sententia conformi in his

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

causis consequitur, ut ulterior propositio non debeat admitti, nisi novis prolatis iisdemque gravibus argumentis vel documentis.

CAN. 1904

§ 1. Res iudicata praesumptione iuris et de iure habetur vera et iusta nec impugnari directe potest.

§ 2. Facit ius inter partes et dat exceptionem ad impediendam novam eiusdem causae introductionem.

The Code determines very clearly when a res becomes iudicata, namely:

1.° After two uniform sentences have been pronounced on the same case, i.e., in the first and second instance, or in the second and third instance.

2.° After a sentence which has not been appealed within the time granted by law. The same holds good when a sentence, though appealed to the judge who pronounced it, was not prosecuted at the court of appeals.

3.° After one sentence in cases in which no appeal is admitted, according to can. 1880. Certain cases never pass into the stage of adjudged matter because they affect the public welfare, which can. 1903 connects with the status personarum, or the personal state of the litigants, which certainly affects the clerical, religious, and married state. Therefore sentences passed on the validity of ordination, of religious profession, and of marriage do not become res iudicatae, even though the requisites of can. 1902 are verified.[1] Yet even these cases, if a double uniform sentence was pronounced, cannot again be proposed unless new and weighty evidence or documents are

1 We hardly think that other cases, such as beneficiary or sentences of excommunication (Bouix, l. c., II, p. 284 f.) would now be considered; concerning criminal cases, see can. 1701–1705.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google produced, because judicial sentences are safeguards of public tranquillity and must be respected.

Can. 1904 enumerates the effect of a res iudicata, which are:

1. That it creates a true and just praesumptio iuris et de iure which can be attacked or upset only indirectly. This, of course, must be understood in the light of what was said on presumption (can. 1825 sqq.). A res iudicata is taken for a true and just sentence because the party accepts it, and the trial must be supposed to have been conducted properly.[2] Yet if the victorious party would admit the iniquity of a sentence, or if ocular inspection would prove that it was wrong, the sentence could be impugned, although only indirectly, i.e., by the querela nullitatis or the restitutio in integrum.[3]

2. The second effect is that the res iudicata establishes right between the litigant parties, so that they are entitled to bring action for the execution of the sentence; that furthermore the parties obtain thereby the right of opposing the exception of res iudicata to any future action brought against them in the same matter.

RESTITUTIO IN INTEGRUM

CAN. 1905

§ 1. Adversus sententiam contra quam non suppetat ordinarium remedium appellationis aut querelae nullitatis, datur remedium extraordinarium restitutionis in integrum intra fines can. 1687, 1688, dummodo de evidenti iniustitia rei iudicatae manifesto conste.

2 Canonists used to say: "Sententia illa quae in rem transiit iudicatam tantae est auctoritatis, ut de ente faciat non ens, et de falso verum, et de albo nigrum." Reiffenstuel II, 27, n. 106.

3 Reiffenstuel, II, 27, n. 128 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. De iniustitia autem manifesto constare non censetur, nisi:

1.° Sententia documentis innitatur, quae postea fuerint falsa deprehensa;

2.° Postea detecta fuerint documenta, quae facta nova et contrariam decisionem exigentia peremptorie probent;

3.° Sententia ex dolo partis prolata fuerit in damnum alterius;

4.° Legis praescriptum evidenter neglectum fuerit.

CAN. 1906

Ad restitutionem in integrum concedendam competens est iudex qui sententiam tulit, nisi ea petatur ex neglecto a iudice praescripto legis; quo in casu eam concedit tribunal appellationis.

CAN. 1907

§ 1. Petitio restitutionis in integrum sententiae executionem nondum inceptam suspendit.

§ 2. Si tamen suspicio sit ex probabilibus indiciis petitionem factam esse ad moras exsecutioni nectendas, iudex decernere potest ut sententia exsecutioni demandetur, assignata tamen restitutionem petenti idonea cautione ut, si restituatur in integrum, indemnis fiat.

This remedy of redressing an evident injustice is called an extraordinary one and means a re-instatement or return of the case to the state in which it was prior to the sentence. Therefore it should be employed not as a rule, but only in case the injustice is manifest. This can be proved:

1.° By showing that the sentence was based on docu-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ments which were later found to be false or forged, as may happen in last wills and in baptismal or marriage certificates;

2.° By producing documents which peremptorily establish new facts that were formerly unknown and require an entirely contrary decision;

3.° By showing that the sentence was procured in favor of one party by the artifice or deceit of the other; but since deceit must be strictly proved, this process would require at least two trustworthy witnesses;

4.° By showing that the rules prescribed by law were set aside.

The competent judge for granting the restitutio is the one who pronounced the sentence, except in cases where the regulations prescribed by law have been neglected, when the court of appeal is competent to grant it.

A re-instatement suspends the execution of the sentence, if it has not already begun. But if the judge surmises that the restitutio was asked for merely to delay execution, he may issue a decree to the effect that the execution take place, but in that case bail must be given to the party demanding the restitution in order to safeguard indemnification.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE XVI

TRIAL EXPENSES AND GRATUITOUS DEFENCE

This title is divided into two chapters, of which the first treats of the expenses of a trial conducted for such as are able to defray them, while the other sets forth the rules for gratuitous trials.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER I

REGULAR EXPENSES

CAN. 1908

In causis contentiosis possunt partes adigi ad aliquid solvendum, titulo expensarum iudicialium, nisi ab hoc onere eximantur ad norman can. 1914–1916.

CAN. 1909

§ 1. Concilii provincialis, vel conventus Episcoporum est taxarum notulam ac regulam statuere in qua praefiniatur quid partes debeant pro expensis iudicialibus; quae sit retributio pro advocatorum et procuratorum opera a partibus solvenda; quae mercedis mensura pro versionibus et transcriptionibus; pro his examinandis et fide facienda de earum fidelitate; itemque pro exscribendis ex archivo documentis.

§ 2. Potest autem iudex pro suo prudenti arbitrio exigere ut pecunia pro iudicialibus expensis, pro indemnitate testium, pro honorariis peritorum debita a parte quae petit vel, si iudex ex officio agat, ab actore, antea deponatur penes tribunalis cancellariam aut saltem congrua cautio praestetur pecuniam deinde solutum iri.

CAN. 1910

§ 1. Victus victori iudiciales expensas regulariter reficere tenetur tum in causa principali tum in incidenti.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Si actor vel reus temere litigaverit, etiam ad damnorum refectionem damnari debet.

Can. 1911

Si actor vel reus partialiter tantum succubuerit, aut lis agitata fuerit inter consanguineos vel affines, aut de quaestione valde ardua actum fuerit, aut quacunque alia iusta et gravi de causa, poterit iudex pro suo prudenti arbitrio ex toto vel ex parte inter litigantes expensas compensare; idque debet exprimere in ipso sententiae tenore.

Can. 1912

Si plures sint in causa qui condemnationem ad expensas mereantur, iudex eos damnet in solidum, si agatur de obligatione solidali; aliter pro rata.

Can. 1913

§ 1. A pronuntiatione circa expensas non datur appellatio; sed pars quae se gravatam putat, oppositionem intra decem dies facere potest coram eodem iudice: qui de hac re cognoscere denuo poterit, et taxationem emendare ac moderari.

§ 2. Appellatio a sententia circa causam principalem secumfert appellationem a pronuntiatione circa expensas.

Unless the parties are paupers, or quasi-paupers, they are to bear the expenses of civil trials. The charges to be made by diocesan courts should be established at a provincial council or meeting of the bishops, who should prescribe regular fees:

a) for the counsel and proctor;

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

b) for translations and copies of documents;

c) for the examination and verification of documents;

d) for the copying of certificates or documents from the archives.

The sum to cover the judicial expenses must be deposited with the court chancery, if the judge deems it appropriate, or be demanded in the form of bond or bail, either by the party who asks for a deposition, or by the plaintiff, if the judge orders a deposition. This sum should include the expenses of the trial for witness fees and the honorarium to be paid to the experts.

The loser must, as a rule, pay the expenses of the trial in the main as well as in incidental issues to the winner. Rash trials, i.e., such commenced and prosecuted without a semblance of justice, entail indemnification to be paid by him who caused the trial, be he plaintiff or defendant.

The judge may, if he deems it prudent, distribute the expenses among both parties, in the following cases:

1) If the victory of either party is only partial;

2) If the parties are related to each other by consanguinity or affinity;

3) If the case was a very difficult one, or

4) For any other just and reasonable cause.

However, this sharing of costs must be properly mentioned in the sentence.

If those condemned to pay the expenses are several, and had a common cause, the judge must condemn each for the whole (in solidum), otherwise, i.e., if they were only co-partners without a common obligation, each has to pay his share.

Appeal from the sentence condemning one to pay the expenses of a trial cannot be made separately or distinctly from the main appeal; but the party who believes himself aggrieved may oppose the sentence within ten days before the same judge, who shall reconsider his sentence and either change or modify the tax imposed. But an appeal against the sentence in the main issue also implies an appeal from the sentence condemning the party in question to pay the expenses.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER II

GRATUITOUS DEFENCE

CAN. 1914

Pauperes, si in totum impares sint expensis iudicialibus sustinendis, ius habent ad gratuitum patrocinium; si ex parte tantum, ad expensarum deminutionem.

CAN. 1915

§1. Qui exemptionem ab expensis vel earum deminutionem assequi vult, eam a iudice postulare debet, dato supplici libello, allatisque documentis quibus quae conditio sit postulantis quaeve eius rei familiaris copia demonstret; praeterea probare debet se non futilem neque temerariam causam agere.

§ 2. Iudex postulationem nec admittat nec reiiciat, nisi requisitis, si opus sit, notitiis etiam secretis quibus statum rei familiaris ipsius postulantis compertum habere possit auditoque promotore iustitiae; imo concessam potest etiam revocare, si in decursu processus assertam paupertatem non adesse compertum habuerit.

CAN. 1916

§ 1. Ad gratuitum pauperum patrocinium iudex in singulis causis eligat aliquem ex advocatis in suo foro approbatum, qui ab hoc munere explendo, nisi ex causa iudici probata, sese subducere nequit, secus a iudice congrua poena, etiam suspensionis ab officio, plecti potest.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Deficientibus advocatis, iudex Ordinarium loci roget ut aliam idoneam personam, si opus sit, designet ad pauperis patrocinium suscipiendum.

Paupers who are entirely unable to defray the expenses of a trial are entitled to gratuitous defence; quasi-paupers, i.e., such as are able to pay something, may have the expenses lowered. But those who claim either total or partial exemption from the payment of judiciary expenses, must submit a petition to the judge, in which they prove by documents that their financial condition entitles them to this privilege and, besides, that the reason for which they are going to law is solid and not rash. The judge shall neither admit nor reject the petition before he has ascertained (by secret information if necessary) the financial status of the petitioner, and heard the advice of the fiscal promoter. He may revoke the grant if he finds out afterwards that the poverty of the petitioner was a pretence.

After granting the petition, the judge shall, in each case, choose an approved attorney or counsel for the defence. This lawyer is not allowed to shirk the duty unless for a reason accepted by the judge. If he attempts to evade his duty, he may be punished by the judge, even to privation from his office of court attorney. If there are no attorneys, the judge may ask the Ordinary to appoint some other capable person to assume the defence.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE XVII

EXECUTION OF THE SENTENCE

The text first considers when a sentence is ready for execution, then the duties of the executor, and, lastly, the manner or mode of execution.

THE TIME OF EXECUTION

CAN. 1917

§ 1. Sententia quae transiit in rem iudicatam, exsecutioni mandari potest.

§ 2. Iudex tamen potest sententiae, quae nondum transiit in rem iudicatam, provisoriam exsecutionem iubere:

1.° Si agatur de provisionibus seu praestationibus ad necessariam sustentationem ordinatis;

2.° Si alia gravis urgeat necessitas, ita tamen ut, concessa provisoria exsecutione, per cautiones, fideiiussiones aut pignora satis consultum sit indemnitati alterius partis casu quo exsecutio revocanda sit.

CAN. 1918

Non antea exsecutioni locus esse poterit, quam exsecutorium iudicis decretum habeatur, quo scilicet edicatur sententiam ipsam exsecutioni mandari debere; quod decretum pro diversa causarum natura vel in ipso sententiae tenore includatur vel separatim edatur.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1919

Si sententiae exsecutio praeviam rationum redditionem exigat, causa incidens habetur, ab illo ipso iudice, servatis de iure servandis, decidenda, qui tulit sententiam exsecutioni mandandam.

Since the res iudicata establishes a (subjective) right and precludes appeal, a sentence may be executed after the matter has been adjudged.

However, the judge may command provisional execution even before the sentence has become res iudicata, if

a) The execution concerns payments or warrants necessary for support, as in the case of alimony;

b) For other urgent reasons. However, every provisional execution pre-supposes a guarantee for the other party's indemnification in case the execution has to be repealed. This is done by bail, bonds, or securities. In order to proceed legitimately to execution, a decree by the judge ordering execution is required. This decree may be either inserted in the writ of the sentence itself, or published separately.

Should the execution of the sentence require the rendering of accounts, as in cases of alienation or benefices, an incidental question arises, which is to be settled by the judge who pronounced the sentence of execution.

THE EXECUTOR

CAN. 1920

§ 1. Sententiam exsecutioni mandare debet per se vel per alium Ordinarius loci in quo sententia primi gradus lata est.

§ 2. Quod si hic renuat vel negligat, parte cuius interest instante vel etiam ex officio, exsecutio spectat ad iudicem appellationis.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 3. Inter religiosos exsecutio sententiae spectat ad Superiorem, qui definitivam sententiam tulit aut iudicem delegavit.

CAN. 1921

§ 1. Exsecutor, nisi quid eius arbitrio in ipso sententiae tenore fuerit permissum, debet sententiam ipsam, secundum obvium verborum sensum, exsecutioni mandare.

§ 2. Licet ei videre de exceptionibus circa modum et vim exsecutionis, non autem de merito causae; quod si habeat aliunde compertum sententiam esse manifeste iniustam, abstineat ab exsecutione, et partem ad eum qui exsecutionem commisit, remittat.

The executor has to put the sentence into effect. He may be a merus executor or a mixtus. If he is a "mere executor," like a bailiff or a constable, he simply reads the tenor of the decree of execution and carries it out literally. But if he is a mixtus — which must be ascertained from the wording of the decree — he may take cognizance of eventual exceptions or objections made by the losing party concerning the mode and efficacy of the execution, and if convinced that the sentence is unjust, must refrain from execution and direct the party to the judge or whoever commanded the execution.

The execution should be carried out, either personally or through a delegate, by the local Ordinary of the diocese in which the trial was prosecuted in the first instance. If he refuses or neglects to put the sentence into effect, the interested party may demand execution from the court of appeal, who may execute the sentence ex officio in case of refusal or neglect of the lower court.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Concerning religious, the executor is the superior who pronounced the definitive sentence or delegated the judge.

MODE OF EXECUTION

CAN. 1922

§ 1. Quod attinet ad reales actiones, adiudicata actori re aliqua, haec actori tradenda est statim ac res iudicata habetur.

§ 2. Quod vero attinet ad actiones personales, cum reus damnatus est ad rem mobilem praestandam, vel ad solvendam pecuniam, vel ad aliud dandum aut faciendum, quadrimestre conceditur pro implenda obligatione.

§ 3. Iudex potest terminum praescriptum vel reducere vel protrahere, ita tamen ut neque infra bimestre coarctetur, neque semestre excedat.

CAN. 1923

§ 1. In exsecutione peragenda exsecutor caveat ut quam minimum damnato noceatur, eaque de causa incipiat exsecutionem a distrahendis rebus quae minus ei necessariae sunt, salvis semper quae eius victui vel industriae deserviunt; et si agatur de clerico, salva honesta eiusdem sustentatione ad norman can. 122.

§ 2. Ad exsecutionem privationis beneficii iudex ne procedat contra clericum qui Sanctam Sedem adierit; sed si agatur de beneficio, cui adnexa sit animarum cura, Ordinarius provideat per designationem vicarii substituti.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1924

Exsecutor utatur prius monitis et praeceptis erga reluctantem; ad poenas autem spirituales et ad censuras ne deveniat, nisi ex necessitate et gradatim.

An object gained by real action and adjudged to the plaintiff must be delivered to the latter immediately after the res has become iudicata. But in personal actions[1] a term of four months is granted to the one who is condemned to hand over a movable object, or to pay a certain sum, or to give or do something. However, the judge may reduce this term to two months or prolong it to six months, neither less nor more.

In executing the sentence, care must be taken that no unnecessary damage is inflicted. Therefore, the less necessary things must be taken first, but enough must be left for a man's support and the exercise of his profession or trade. In the case of clerics the beneficium competentiae must be applied.[2] No cleric may be deprived of his benefice by way of execution, if he has had recourse to the Holy See. If the benefice is one to which the care of souls is attached, the Ordinary shall appoint a temporary substitute.

The executor shall first admonish and urge, and proceed to spiritual penalties and censures only by degrees and in case of necessity.

1 See can. 1701.
2 See can. 122, Vol. II, of our Commentary, p. 67 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

SECTION II

SPECIAL RULES FOR CERTAIN TRIALS

TITLE XVIII

WAYS OF AVOIDING TRIALS

Christians should avoid quarrels and their evil consequences, trials.[1] Therefore the legislator exhorts disputants to compose their differences peacefully. This may be done by compromise or by arbitration.

1 Cfr. I Cor. 6, 1 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER I

COMPROMISE

A compromise may be defined as the surrender of a supposed legal claim by peaceful settlement and for a consideration.[1] The effect of this is called composition or concord. This means should always be recommended by the judge when he is approached. A compromise may be offered before the party appears in court or when the parties have appeared, or at any other time that may be propitious for such an agreement. But the proposal should be made, not by the judge himself, to safeguard his authority, but by an intermediary person, especially a priest or synodal judge.

As to the rules to be followed, the civil law of each country must be obeyed, provided it does not clash with the divine and ecclesiastical law. Besides, the following rules must be observed:

1. No compromise is admissible (a) in criminal cases, (b) in civil cases which concern the solution of a marriage, (c) in beneficiary matters when the possessory title is involved, without the intervention of the ecclesiastical authority, (d) in spiritual things, as often as the payment of temporal goods is concerned, because of the danger of simony.

2. A compromise is permitted, (a) if merely temporal ecclesiastical property is concerned, (b) if spiritual things are involved, but can be dealt with separately, as, for in-

1 See Harriman, The Law of Contracts, 1901, § 112.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google stance, burial ground. But in those two cases the formalities prescribed for alienation must be observed, if the matter requires it, as stated in can. 1530 ff.

The effect of a compromise is called composition or concord.

The expenses must be shared equally by the parties, unless otherwise stated in the compromise.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER II

COMPROMISE BY ARBITRATION

If the parties, in order to avoid a trial, agree to commit the settlement of their dispute to one or more persons, there is a compromise by arbitration. This is twofold, according as the compromissarii proceed under the strict rules of the law, in which case they are called arbiters (arbitri), or proceed according to the rules of equity, in which case they are known as arbitrators (arbitratores). But both kinds of compromissarii must observe the rules laid down in can. 1926 and 1927.

No one who has been under a declaratory or condemnatory sentence of excommunication or infamy may validly act as an arbiter (though he may be an arbitrator). Religious need the permission of their superiors to act as arbitri.

If neither compromise nor arbitration brings about the desired settlement, the dispute must be decided according to the rules laid down in section one of this Book.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XIX

CRIMINAL TRIALS

CAN. 1933

§ 1. Delicta quae cadunt sub criminali iudicio sunt delicta publica.

§ 2. Excipiuntur delicta plectenda sanctionibus poenalibus de quibus in can. 2168–2194.

§ 3. In delictis mixti fori Ordinarii regulariter ne procedant cum reus laicus est et civilis magistratus, in reum animadvertens, publico bono satis consulit.

§ 4. Poenitentia, remedium poenale, excommunicatio, suspensio, interdictum, dummodo delictum certum sit, infligi possunt etiam per modum praecepti extra iudicium.

The Church, being endowed with judiciary power over her members, has the right to take cognizance of, and to punish, crimes committed in defiance of her laws. However, in matter of fact, as our canon explicitly acknowledges (§ 3), criminal trials are now-a-days almost exclusively reserved for clerical offenders.

Can. 120 lays down the rules to be observed when a cleric is to be summoned by a civil or lay court: if the accused is of high rank (cardinal, bishop or prelate nullius), the permission of the Holy See is required; if he is of inferior rank (abbot,[1] priest, cleric, religious)

1 Concerning an abbot we have our doubts whether the local Ordinary is competent to give permission; but can. 120 only mentions abbot nullius as requiring the consent of the Holy See if he is not

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the Ordinary in whose diocese the trial is to be held, must give permission, or at least be informed. But official procedure against clerics is to be conducted before the ecclesiastical court.

It is scarcely necessary to add that the rules set forth in this title are law everywhere, and that no particular regulations opposed to these can be safely followed in criminal prosecution. The instructions of the various S. Congregations, including that of the S. C. EE. et RR., of June 11, 1880, are no longer in force for criminal procedure.[2] This fact should be carefully noted to avoid mistakes in conducting a trial and thereby, perhaps, exposing the procedure to the danger of nullity.

1. The crimes subject to criminal procedure must be public. A crime is defined in can. 2195 as an external and a morally imputable violation of the law, to which is attached a canonical sanction or penalty, at least undetermined. The crime is public if it is already divulged or has been committed under circumstances which make it liable to be divulged (can. 2197, n. 1).

2. Exempted from criminal procedure are the cases for which other penalties are sanctioned in law. These are:

a) Procedure against non-resident clergymen; can. 2168–2175.

b) Procedure against concubinarii clerici; can. 2176–2181.

c) Procedure against pastors who neglect their pastoral duties; can. 2182–2185.

ordinarius proprius of a religious plaintiff. The proper way would be to apply to the next highest superior of exempt religious, viz., the abbot president, and, if the accused is a provincial, to the superior general.

2 This applies also to Benedict XIV's, "Ad militantis," March 30, 1742; the Instruction quoted above see Coll. P. F., Vol. II, p. 134, n. 1534, also Messmer, Canonical Procedure, 1897, Appendix. One accustomed to the old procedure is likely to make mistakes.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

d) The procedure called ex informata conscientia; can. 2186–2194.

These cases then are not to be prosecuted in criminal form, but in the manner established by the respective canons.

3. Against crimes which may be prosecuted either in the civil or in the ecclesiastical court (mixti fori) Ordinaries, should, as a rule, not proceed if the accused is a layman and the civil authority is already prosecuting him, thus safeguarding the public welfare.

Mixed crimes are such as principally offend against religion, but also concern the public welfare. Such are sacrilege, perjury, blasphemy (even though not heretical), theft of ecclesiastical property, incestuous concubinage, clandestine marriage, bigamy.[3]

Note well the conditions for proceeding: the criminal must be a layman, and the public order in need of being restored. But one essential element of criminal procedure as we regard it is the restoration of the public order (see Book V). The Church, being the divinely appointed custodian of public morality, is entitled to prosecute such cases if the civil authority fails to perform its duty. Hence the ecclesiastical authority cannot be lawfully rejected as accuser before the lay criminal court, if the public welfare is involved and the civil law provides no punishment for such crimes. Spiritism in all its forms should receive more attention from our criminal courts.[4]

4. Penances and penal remedies (can. 2306–2313) excommunication, suspension, interdict, may be inflicted by way of a precept, without a trial, whenever the delinquency is fully proved. This is new law, except in so

[3] Cfr. Wernz, Ius Decretalium, Vol. V, P. II, n. 805, p. 44.

[4] The State should provide special asylums for demented subjects, where they can be treated individually.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

far as the suspensio ex informata conscientia is concerned. Formerly censures, being looked upon as severe punishments, were held to require an ecclesiastical trial.

How the precept is to be observed, is stated in can. 2310.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER I

CRIMINAL ACTION AND DENUNCIATION

CAN. 1934

Actio seu accusatio criminalis uni promotori iustitiae, ceteris omnibus exclusis, reservatur.

CAN. 1935

§ 1. Quilibet tamen fidelium semper potest delictum alterius denuntiare ad satisfactionem petendam vel damnum sibi resarciendum, vel etiam studio iustitiae ad alicuius scandali vel mali reparationem.

§ 2. Imo obligatio denuntiationis urget quotiescumque ad id quis adigitur sive lege vel peculiari legitimo praecepto, sive ex ipsa naturali lege ob fidei vel religionis periculum vel aliud imminens publicum malum.

CAN. 1936

Denuntiatio scriptis a denuntiante subsignatis vel oretenus fieri debet loci Ordinario, vel cancellario Curiae vel vicariis foraneis vel parochis, a quibus tamen, si viva voce facta fuerit, scriptis est consignanda et statim ad Ordinarium deferenda.

CAN. 1937

Qui delictum denuntiat debet promotori iustitiae adiumenta suppeditare ad eiusdem delicti probationem.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 1938

§ 1. In causa iniuriarum aut diffamationis, ut actio criminalis instituatur, requiritur praevia denuntiatio aut querela partis laesae.

§ 2. Sed si agatur de iniuria aut diffamatione gravi, clerico vel religioso, praesertim in dignitate constituto, illata, aut quam clericus vel religiosus alii intulerit, actio criminalis institui potest etiam ex officio.

Every criminal procedure involves three essential points — the accusation, the trial, and the sentence. Without any one of these the whole procedure would be null and void.

The first and most necessary step is the accusation, for, "where there is no accuser, there is no accused." But there is a noticeable distinction between judicial accusation and simple accusation, which is more properly styled denunciation.[1] The judicial accusation may be most properly called an indictment, which ensures legal action or procedure, and is (can. 1934) reserved to the fiscal promotor, to the exclusion of all other persons, even the local Ordinary. Hence the judicial accusation can be lodged only by an official who is the promotor iustitiae.

This official character of the accusation is apparent in the older Roman Law, which permitted only a magistrate to act as accuser when a criminal case was tried before the comitia. However, after the standing commissions

1 The English terms: indictment, presentment, warrant, do not accurately convey the Latin terms. Indictment comes nearest to official accusation, which is preferred to, and presented upon oath by, a grand jury. A presentment is the notice taken by a grand jury of any offence from their own knowledge or observation, without any bill of indictment laid before them. A warrant is an official precept authorizing arrest, distress or search, under the seal of a justice or court, but solicited by private persons. Blackstone, l. c., IV, 289, 301 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(quaestiones perpetuae) had been introduced, about 149 B. C., the so-called delatores sprang up like mushrooms. Any Roman citizen could come forward and prefer a charge.[2] The ecclesiastical law, being, as to formalities, largely modelled upon the Roman law, admitted as real and formal accusers all those not expressly prohibited by law. This is noticeable in Gratian's Decree. However, heretical tendencies made a partial departure from the old methods necessary and gave rise to inquisitorial proceedings, especially in heresy cases. In order that these inquisitors may not act as judges and accusers, at least one of them should be a promoter.[3]

The medieval inquisitors, taken mainly from the Friars Preachers, acted in the name of the Apostolic See. Besides these, the Ordinaries or Bishops were regarded as inquisitores nati, each for his own diocese, and the provincial councils, which had to be held every year, were also charged with the duty of watching over the faith.[4]

This, broadly speaking, was the status up to the publication of the Instruction of 1880. For, although a summary proceeding had been introduced by the Clementine Decretals and the suspensio ex informata conscientia by the Council of Trent, yet the handling of criminal cases remained stationary and was somewhat neglected. The S. C. of Bishops and Regulars, by issuing the above mentioned Instruction, which in fact was nothing else but a compendium of former decisions, gave a new impetus to criminal procedure. The Instruction states the reason why the summary procedure was promoted, namely, because the Church was hindered on every side in the exercise of her judiciary action. It named the 2 Ramsay-Lanciani, Roman Antiquities, 1900, p. 332, p. 334.

3 Wernz, l. c., p. 55, n. 817.
4 Bouix, De Iudiciis Eccl., II, p. 365 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

diocesan court, viz., the bishop, the vicar-general, and the processus instructor, as the chief factors in criminal procedure and required the co-operation of the fiscal promoter.

Now this promotor iustitiae has become so important that he alone is entitled to bring criminal action against offenders. This process, as stated, corresponds to our civil indictment.

Different from the indictment is simple denunciation, or, as we may call it for brevity's sake, the warrant. Canon 1935 defines the right and obligation of denunciation as follows:

1. Every Catholic has the right to denounce the crime of another, either (a) to demand satisfaction or indemnity, or (b) for the sake of justice, i.e., that scandal may be repaired or evil counteracted. In the first case the motive is personal interest, and the case should therefore be classified among torts (such as libel and damage suits). In the second case the intention of the accuser is the restoration of justice, which suffers through any crime.

"Quilibet fidelis" must be understood in the light of the following considerations: (a) It is a mere denunciation; (b) where private interests only are involved, every believing person, i.e., every Catholic, may be admitted, though formerly laymen were not permitted to act as accusers against clergymen;[5] (c) when the public welfare is concerned, as in cases of simony and others mentioned in § 2, can. 1934, anyone is admitted as accuser,[6] but with due regard to can. 1942, § 2, which says that

[5] C. 14, X, II, 20.

[6] Cc. 3, 7, X, V, 3. Practically it is true what Wernz (l. c., P. II, n. 835) says, that criminosi, excommunicati, inimici, infames, anonymi, plane ignoti are not admitted as accusers, because their denunciation is worth nothing; but theoretically our text does not discriminate against them, except as stated above.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google denunciation by manifest enemies and by mean and unworthy persons should be counted as nothing.

2. The obligation of denouncing another becomes urgent when (a) one is obliged to do so by law, or (b) by a special precept, or (c) in virtue of the natural law, which dictates that every danger to faith and religion and every menace of public evil should be averted.

Ad a) The common law makes denunciation imperative:

1.° Against confessarii sollicitantes ad turpia (can. 904; 2368, n. 2);

2.° When one knows of impediments to the reception of holy orders (can. 999);

3.° Or of the existence of matrimonial impediments (can. 1027);

4.° Or of the circulation of dangerous books (can. 1397);

5.° Or of clergymen and religious being members of Masonic sects (can. 2336).

Ad b) By special precept Ordinaries and religious superiors may command their subjects to denounce certain crimes or persons suspected of wrongdoing; this, however, greatly depends on the constitution of each respective congregation or order.

Ad c) In virtue of the natural law theologians and canonists, though with some shades of variance, hold denunciation (judicial, not evangelical) to be obligatory on a) One who knows of a crime that is very detrimental to the community and has no other means to prevent the evil arising therefrom than denunciation. Such a one is obliged to denounce the crime, even though the act will cause him inconvenience.

b) One who knows of a crime that is hurtful or detrimental to a third person. In this case the duty of denunciation binds only if it entails no inconvenience to the denouncer.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

c) One who knows of a crime that is hurtful only to the perpetrator himself, is under no obligation to denounce it.[7] Sacramental knowledge and professional secrecy always excuse from the duty of denunciation.

Can. 1936 describes the mode of denunciation. The accusation should be made in writing and signed by the accuser, or orally to the local Ordinary, the diocesan chancellor, or the rural dean or pastor (assistants or curates are not mentioned, and therefore can not lawfully accept a denunciation).

If a denunciation is lodged orally, it must be put in writing by the persons to whom it is made and immediately forwarded to the Ordinary. The latter clause has special significance, for it means that the ecclesiastics mentioned in the text as competent to receive denunciations, are not allowed to make investigation, summon witnesses or conduct a quasi-trial. Religious superiors must keep their hands off all matters pertaining to the Holy Office. If a subject is guilty of such a violation, the religious superior must denounce him, either directly to the Holy Office, or to the local Ordinary.[8]

Since the denouncer forms, as it were, one person with the fiscal promoter, the latter is entitled to demand all the evidence and the assistance of the accuser, in order to prove the crime (can. 1937).[9]

A damage or libel suit, which is of a personal or private character, necessarily requires a previous warrant or complaint by the party who believes himself injured; other-

7 Cfr. Bouix, De Iud. Eccl., II, p. 51; Sabetti-Barrett, Theol. Moral., ed. 27, 1919, p. 180, n. 181.

8 S. O., May 15, 1901 (Coll. P. F., n. 2112); our Commentary, Vol. III, p. 110; can. 501, § 2.

9 Regulae S. R. R., Aug. 4, 1910, § 41 n. 1 (A. Ap. S., II, 799).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

wise no criminal action can follow. This is the practice in every civilized court, based on the assumption that the damage or defamation concerns private interests only. However, since the clerical or religious state is a privileged one in the Catholic Church, and injury or defamation brought upon any one of its members affects the whole state, especially if the injured member holds some rank or dignity, like prelates, it is but logical that only official criminal action may be brought against the delinquent. This rule applies also to cases where a clergyman or religious has defamed or injured another of his class (can. 1938). Here the percussio clericorum might enter, provided the offence was public and perpetrated in a scandalous manner.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

INQUEST

To justify the term inquest for inquisitio, we refer to can. 1954, for inquisitio forms part and parcel of the inquisitorial acts to be delivered to the fiscal promoter. Hence the term is here to be taken for judicial inquiry, which is a preliminary and an absolutely essential part of criminal procedure.[1] There is an inquiry mentioned in can. 1939, but this is of a general character, and therefore may be called extra-judicial. Here the Code intends judicial inquiry, defining when and by whom it is to be made, how it should be conducted, and what follows when it is completed.

INQUEST — WHEN AND BY WHOM TO BE MADE

CAN. 1939

§ 1. Si delictum nec notorium sit nec omnino certum, sed innotuerit sive ex rumore et publica fama, sive ex denuntiatione, sive ex querela damni, sive ex inquisitione generali ab Ordinario facta, sive alia quavis ratione, antequam quis citetur ad respondendum de delicto, inquisitio specialis est praemittenda ut constet an et quo fundamento innitatur imputatio.

§ 2. Huic regulae locus est sive agatur de irroganda poena vindicativa vel censura, sive de ferenda sententia

1 This process was formerly called inquisitio pro informando iudice or simply processus; S. C. EE. et RR., June 11, 1880, n. 10; S. O., Aug. 6, 1897, n. 3 (Coll. P. F., nn. 1534, 1977); Messmer, l. c., p. 53.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

declaratoria poenae vel censurae in quam quis inciderit.

CAN. 1940

Haec inquisitio, quamvis ab ipso loci Ordinario peragi possit, ex generali tamen regula committenda est alicui ex iudicibus synodalibus, nisi eidem Ordinario ex peculiari ratione alii committenda videatur.

CAN. 1941

§ 1. Inquisitor delegetur non ad universitatem causarum, sed toties quoties et ad unam causam.

§ 2. Inquisitor tenetur iisdem obligationibus quibus iudices ordinarii, ac praesertim praestare debet iusiurandum de secreto servando deque officio fideliter implendo et abstinere ab accipiendis muneribus ad normam can. 1621–1624.

§ 3. Inquisitor nequit in eadem causa iudicem agere.

CAN. 1942

§ 1. Prudenti Ordinarii iudicio committitur statuere quandonam ea, quae praesto sunt argumenta, sufficiant ad inquisitionem instituendam.

§ 2. Nihili faciendae sunt denuntiationes quae ab inimico manifesto, aut ab homine vili et indigno proveniunt, vel anonymae iis adiunctis iisque aliis elementis carentes, quae accusationem forte probabilem reddant.

1. A special inquest is required in cases (a) where the crime is neither notorious nor entirely certain, viz., uncertain as to the fact or its imputability to the person denounced, but known only (b) through rumor and hearsay,[2] or (c) by semi-official information, viz., denunciation, complaint of damage, general inquiry made by the Ordinary, or in any other strictly extra-judicial way.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2. The time for the inquest to be held is before one is summoned or judicially cited.

3. The purpose of the inquest is to ascertain whether and on what ground the crime may be imputed.[3]

4. With regard to the penalty § 2 of can. 1939 states that an inquest must be held whenever a vindictive penalty or censure is to be inflicted — ab homine — or only a declaration of sentence is required, viz., a declaration that the penalty or censure has been incurred. Comparing this text with can. 1933, § 4 it might seem that there is a contradiction, but this is not the case. For canon 1933 supposes the certainty of the crime. Besides, this inquest, as stated, has already given a legal turn to the procedure, and therefore legal means are required for inflicting the penalty.

The next question is, Who may act as inquisitor? Answer: The local Ordinary, i.e., the bishop or his vicar-general, may personally conduct the inquest. The law is permissive rather than preceptive in this case, but it adds that as a rule the business of holding the inquest should be committed to one of the synodal judges. But the Ordinary may, for special reasons, choose another, who, according to the instructions of the Roman Congregations, should be a learned, righteous, and capable priest, or at least a cleric.[4]

The inquisitor is a delegate, and hence does not remain in office permanently, but is chosen for each single

2 Cfr. can. 2197; S. C. EE. et S. O., Aug. 6, 1897, n. 6; S. C. EE. et RR., June 11, 1880, n. 12.

3 On imputability, see can. 2199 ff.

4 S. O., Aug. 6, 1897, n. 6; S. C. EE. et RR., June 11, 1880, n. 12.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

case (ad hoc) and needs special delegation for each. The conclusion: "N. has been delegated for this case, hence he may act also in the next case," would, therefore, be entirely wrong and would nullify the whole procedure.[5]

The inquisitor is under the same obligations as the judge in ordinary, and must therefore give oath that he will keep the secret, conscientiously discharge his duties, and accept no donations or bribes.

The inquisitor cannot validly act as judge in the same case. The consequence is that a synodal judge chosen as inquisitor cannot pro hac vice also act as judge.

It is hardly necessary to add that the delegation must be given expressly, since the office of inquisitor is not attached to any particular judiciary office, either that of synodal judge, or of counsel, or of auditor and that the delegate must adhere strictly to his commission or mandate, the limits of which he may not exceed, if any are drawn in the writ.

The inquisitor should not proceed with the inquest until the Ordinary has prudently judged or decided that the evidence so far obtained is sufficient to institute a formal inquest. Hence it lies with the Ordinary to give orders for the inquest. What if the Ordinary doubts the sufficiency of the materials thus far collected? He may order other secret information to be gathered and call in witnesses who know the incriminated person and the accusers, and make them respond under oath to the questions put to them.[6] These depositions, of course, must be diligently kept, for they may be of service in the trial.

Can. 1942, § 2 proceeds to determine negatively the sufficiency of evidence, thus: Denunciations should be counted for nothing if: (a) they are made by manifest

[5] S. O., l. c.

[6] S. O., Aug. 6, 1897, nn. 3, 5.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google enemies or by mean and unworthy persons; or if they are (b) anonymous and lack the necessary details to render the accusation at least probable.

"Homines viles et indigni" are persons of ill fame,[7] and, a fortiori, all who are infamous in fact or by law. But vilis may have another meaning, viz., a low character. This would be the case if the accusation were prompted by a bribe or human respect.[8] Enemies are those who wish one ill and are ready to injure one, materially or spiritually. The word manifest implies that a considerable part of a community must know of this enmity of the accuser toward the accused.[9] The word anonymous is here used in a somewhat restricted sense, for anonymous properly means nameless, and nameless letters should, as a rule, not be accepted. Still the text does not reject them absolutely. It may be that a person does not wish to be drawn into a trial, and yet has strong evidence against another. The details demanded are circumstances of time (day, month, year, hour), of place and person (where, when, by and with whom the crime was committed), etc. No vague and general statements or flippant assertions made in anonymous letters can be accepted.

No other persons are excluded from the right of making denunciation. All that is required is that they be Catholics. Hence neither excommunication, nor the interdict, nor suspension debar one,[10] provided he possesses the qualities negatively stated in can. 1942, § 2.

7 Ibid., n. 1.
8 Ibid.,
9 C. 10, X, V, 1; Engel, h. t., n. 9.
10 Consequently the old view of canonists can no longer be held as to the class mentioned in the text.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

MODE OF CONDUCTING THE INQUEST

CAN. 1943

Inquisitio secreta semper esse debet, et cautissime ducenda, ne rumor delicti diffundatur, neve bonum cuiusquam nomen in discrimen vocetur.

CAN. 1944

§ 1. Ad finem suum assequendum potest inquisitor aliquos, quos de re edoctos censeat, ad se accire et interrogare sub iureiurando veritatis dicendae et secreti servandi.

§ 2. In eorum examine servet inquisitor, quantum fieri potest et natura inquisitionis patitur, regulas statutas in can. 1770–1781.

CAN. 1945

Inquisitor, antequam inquisitionem claudat, potest promotoris iustitiae consilium exquirere quoties in aliquam difficultatem inciderit, et cum eo acta communicare.

After the inquisitor has been appointed and informed that the evidence at hand is sufficient, the inquest may begin. But it must always be conducted so secretly and cautiously that no rumor of the crime is allowed to get abroad, and the good name of no one, delinquent, accomplice, or any other person involved, is jeopardized (can. 1944). This, of course, implies strict secrecy, not only on the part of the inquisitor himself, as stated under can. 1941, § 2, but also on the part of all those whose assistance he may require for conducting the inquest.

The inquisitor may call in persons who are acquainted with the accused, or with the accusers, or with the case in general. The number of the persons that may be summoned is not determined. Those who appear may and must be put under oath to speak the truth and, as stated, to keep the whole thing secret. The procedure for examining these persons is much the same as that prescribed for the examination of witnesses (can. 1770–1781).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Our text says, "quantum fieri potest et natura inquisitionis patitur." Hence it would hardly be advisable to confront the witnesses.

The place of the judge is taken by the inquisitor.

No solemn or public summons is required.

If the inquisitor deems it prudent to repair to the domicile of the witness, the law does not forbid him.

In cases of sollicitatio, women may be heard in the sacristy or some other unsuspected place.

If the inquisitor should meet with difficulties, says can. 1945, he may counsel with the fiscal promoter and communicate to him what has been done. But all this must be done before the acts of inquisition are formally closed. The closing of the inquisitorial acts is required in order to mark a stage in the procedure. It is, however, left to the inquisitor to decide when the acts of judicial inquiry are completed, or when the conclusio in causa (can. 1860) is brought about; although no special decree to that effect need be issued.

WHAT IS TO BE DONE AFTER THE INQUEST IS COMPLETED

CAN. 1946

§ 1. Expleta inquisitione, inquisitor, addito suffragio suo, omnia referat ad Ordinarium.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Ordinarius vel de eius speciali mandato officialis suo decreto iubeat ut:

1.° Si appareat denuntiationem solido fundamento esse destitutam, id declaretur in actis et acta ipsa in secreto Curiae archivo reponantur;

2.° Si indicia criminis habeantur, sed nondum sufficientia ad accusatoriam actionem instituendam, acta in eodem archivo serventur et invigiletur interim moribus imputati, qui pro prudenti Ordinarii iudicio erit opportune super re audiendus, et, si casus ferat, monendus ad normam can. 2307;

3.° Si denique certa vel saltem probabilia et sufficientia ad accusationem instituendam argumenta praesto sint, citetur reus ad comparendum et procedatur ad ulteriora ad normam canonum qui sequuntur.

After the acts of inquisition are closed, or the finding is complete in the judgment of the inquisitor, because the evidence is exhausted, he shall formulate his opinion, which is generally styled votum, but is here called suffragium. This votum should, we suppose, be put into writing, although the text does not expressly say so. Together with this statement the inquisitor shall submit his findings to the Ordinary, who has to read the acts carefully in order to come to a conclusion in the three possible hypotheses with which he may now be confronted.

The Ordinary (either the bishop or his vicar-general) may entrust the officialis (see can. 1573) with the inspection of the acts, but it requires a special mandate for each and every case. The Ordinary, then, or the officialis, shall issue a decree adapted to the conclusion resulting from the inspection of the acts:

1.° If the denunciation appears groundless, the decree

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google must so declare and be incorporated with the acts, which are then to be placed in the secret diocesan archives.

2.° If the evidence is insufficient to justify criminal prosecution, the acts must also be deposited in the secret archives of the diocese and the denounced person watched as to his conduct, asked concerning his behavior, and, if necessary, be served an admonition, according to can. 2307.

3.° If the evidence is conclusive, or at least probable and sufficient for criminal prosecution, the delinquent must be summoned to appear in court and proceeded against according to the rules that follow. The sufficiency of the evidence must be judged according to can. 1789–1791 and can. 1812–1818; self-confession according to can. 1750–1753.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER III

REBUKE OF THE DELINQUENT

CAN. 1947

Si reus interrogatus delictum confiteatur, Ordinarius, loco criminalis iudicii, utatur correptione iudiciali si eidem locus sit.

CAN. 1948

Correptio iudicialis locum habere nequit:

1.° In delictis quae poenam secumferunt excommunicationis specialissimo vel speciali modo Sedi Apostolicae reservatae, aut privationis beneficii, infamiae, depositionis aut degradationis;

2.° Quando agitur de ferenda sententia declaratoria poenae vindicativae vel censurae in quam quis inciderit;

3.° Quando Ordinarius existimet eam non sufficere reparationi scandali et restutitioni iustitiae.

CAN. 1949

§ 1. Correptioni locus esse potest semel et iterum, non autem tertio contra eundem reum.

§ 2. Quare si post alteram correptionem reus idem delictum commiserit, criminale iudicium instrui aut inceptum continuari debet ad normam can. 1954 seqq.

CAN. 1950

Intra fines can. 1947, 1948 potest correptio ab Ordinario adhiberi non solum antequam gradus fiat ad

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

formale iudicium, sed etiam eo incepto ante conclusionem in causa; ac tunc quidem iudicium suspenditur, nisi tamen prosequendum idcirco sit quia correptio in irritum cesserit.

CAN. 1951

§ 1. Correptio adhiberi etiam potest, cum interposita fuit querela damni ex delicto.

§ 2. Quo in casu Ordinarius potest de bono et aequo, partibus consentientibus, videre et dirimere quaestionem de damno.

§ 3. Sed si censuerit quaestionem de damno difficulter de bono et aequo posse definiri, licet ipsi, remissa ordini iudiciario solutione huius quaestionis, per correptionem consulere reparationi scandali et emendationi delinquentis.

CAN. 1952

§ 1. Correptio iudicialis, praeter monita salutaria, debet plerumque coniuncta habere quaedam opportuna remedia, aut poenitentiarum vel piorum operum praescriptionem, quae valeant ad publicam reparationem laesae iustitiae aut scandali.

§ 2. Salutaria remedia, poenitentiae, pia opera reo praescribenda, mitiora et leviora esse debent iis, quae in criminali iudicio per sententiam condemnatoriam ipsi infligi possent et deberent.

CAN. 1953

Correptio censetur inutiliter adhibita, si reus remedia, poenitentias et pia opera sibi praescripta non acceptat aut acceptata non exsequatur.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Since the summons can be issued upon certain, or at least probable and sufficient evidence, it is plain that by confession here is meant a judicial confession, i.e., one made in court. The Ordinary, therefore, should ask the person summoned: "You are accused of such a crime; do you plead guilty?" He may insinuate, in general terms, that proofs are available, in order to solicit a true answer. The question then naturally arises: Is the defendant obliged to confess his guilt, if he is guilty and is duly questioned by the Ordinary or his official? A probable opinion obliges the defendant to confess his guilt.[11] However, some authors deny this obligation if the punishment to be expected is very severe and there is hope of escaping it.[12] It is undeniable that the confession would simplify the procedure and also lessen the punishment.

We may add that the question must be put lawfully and that the answer must be given "freely and considerately," according to can. 1751. There is also in lay criminal practice a requisite stated which to us seems very reasonable: confession should not be admitted if made in consequence of any inducement of a temporal character, connected with the accusation, held out to the accused by a person who had some authority over the accusation.[13] For the voluntary character needed for confession would certainly be diminished under these circumstances.

We said that confession would lessen the measure of punishment. This is clearly stated in can. 1947, which 11 S. Thom., II-II, q. 69, art. 1; Messmer, l. c., p. 101, answers "in the affirmative without exception," upon the authority of Konings, Theol. Moral., n. 1072.

12 Thus Lessius, De Lugo, etc. — weighty authorities — quoted by Reiffenstuel, II, 18, n. 163 ff.; the consequence is that the confessor could not refuse absolution in casu, viz., though the penitent refused to confess the guilt judicially.

13 Kenny-Webb, Outlines of Criminal Law, 1907, p. 375.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google says that, after the confession or admission is made, the Ordinary may administer judicial correction or rebuke which is not identical with judicial penalty.

But there are exceptions to the employment of this expedient, and these are stated in can. 1948, which excludes judicial correction.

1. In all crimes, even though confessed, which are punishable by excommunication most especially or especially reserved to the Holy See, or which are punishable in law by privation of benefice, infamy, deposition or degradation (see Book V);

2. In all crimes which require only a declaratory sentence for incurring a vindictive penalty or censure, because de facto already incurred;

3. Whenever the Ordinary deems a judicial correction insufficient to repair the scandal given and to restore justice. This is left to the judgment of the Ordinary.

Aside from these cases the judicial correction may be administered twice, but not oftener. If the second correction has proved fruitless or ineffective to restrain the delinquent from committing the same crime again, criminal procedure must be applied or continued according to can. 1954 ff. If the text uses the term "inceptum continuari," it is because correction may be employed not only before the trial has begun, but at any time during the trial, until the conclusio in causa, i.e., before the whole material is gathered and the acts are closed.

When correction is applied, the trial is suspended, provided the correction was effective, i.e., the corrected person behaves himself (can. 1950).

Correction may also be employed in criminal damage suits, in which the Ordinary may, if the parties consent, settle the question of damages according to the rules of equity. If, however, the difficulty of an equitable settlement proves too great, the Ordinary may refer the matter to the civil court and in the mean while, by judicial correction, repair the scandal and endeavor to correct the delinquent (can. 1951).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Can. 1952 tells us in what judicial correction consists, viz., in wholesome admonitions, combined with appropriate remedies, such as penances and good works, applied to the delinquent in order that he may publicly repair the disturbed order of justice and the scandal given. Of these penances mention is made in can. 2313, where special prayers, pilgrimages, fasts, alms, and retreats are recommended.

However, these remedies do not bear the character of a judicial punishment because the criminal trial has not yet begun, and hence they should be milder than those meted out after a condemnatory sentence.

From this it is apparent that the monita salutaria spoken of in our text must not be taken in the sense of a canonical or judicial admonition, equal to a triple or one peremptory admonition.[14] They are simply wholesome admonitions, but should not be made light of, because can. 1953 shows that, if spurned, they will pave the way for a criminal trial. Hence this canon states that if the delinquent refuses to accept or to use these remedies (penances and pious works imposed upon him) the correction must be looked upon as ineffective and the trial is to proceed.

[14] See Messmer, l. c., p. 145, note 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER IV

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE AND HEARING OF THE DELINQUENT

CAN. 1954

Si correptio iudicialis vel insufficiens sit ad reparationem scandali et restitutionem iustitiae, vel adhiberi nequeat quia reus delictum denegat, vel inutiliter adhibita fuerit, Episcopus, aut officialis, de eius speciali mandato, praecipiat ut acta inquisitionis tradantur promotori iustitiae.

CAN. 1955

Promotor statim conficiat accusationis libellum eumque exhibeat iudici secundum normas in Sectione Prima statutas.

CAN. 1956

In delictis gravioribus, si Ordinarius censeat cum fidelium offensione imputatum ministrare sacris aut officio aliquo spirituali ecclesiastico vel pio fungi aut ad sacram Synaxim publice accedere, potest, audito promotore iustitiae, eum a sacro ministerio, ab illorum officiorum exercitio, vel etiam a publica sacrae Synaxis participatione prohibere ad normam can. 2222, § 2.

CAN. 1957

Pariter si iudex censeat accusatum posse testibus timorem incutere aut eos subornare, aut alio modo

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

iustitiae cursum impedire, potest, audito promotore iustitiae, decreto suo mandare, ut ille ad tempus deserat oppidum vel paroeciam quandam, vel etiam ut secedat in praefinitum locum ibique sub peculari vigilantia maneat.

CAN. 1958

Decreta de quibus in can. 1956, 1957 ferri nequeunt, nisi reo citato et comparente vel contumace, sive post primam eius auditionem seu constitutum, sive postea in decursu processus; et contra eadem non datur iuris remedium.

CAN. 1959

In reliquis serventur regulae in Sectione Prima huius Libri traditae et in inflictione poenarum sanctiones in Libro Quinto statutae.

The Bishop or his officialis, provided the latter has obtained a special mandate to this effect, shall command that the inquisitorial acts be handed to the fiscal promoter in the following cases:

1. If judicial correction was considered insufficient to repair the scandal or to restore justice (can. 1948);

2. If the defendant denies the crimes imputed to him, in which case the judicial correction may not be employed;

3. If judicial correction was ineffective, according to can. 1953.

When any one of these three cases is verified, the fiscal promoter must immediately draw up a bill of complaint or accusation and present it to the judge according to the rules laid down in the first section of this Book (IV).

It will not have escaped the attentive reader that, in chapter III, on correction, there is not one word that would insinuate any special formalities, such as writing or decrees, of which we hear so often in civil procedure, or even of keeping a record of the judicial correction and its effect. Neither do we read of any formal canonical injunction after the admonitions have proved fruitless.[1] Are all these formalities to be omitted? It must be remembered that a trial is based on an inquisition, either by denunciation or formal complaint or by a general and special inquiry. The records of these proceedings must certainly be kept on file for further procedure. In addition to this we believe that the judicial correction must be so administered that it can be proved at the trial. For the defence is undoubtedly entitled to ask whether and how the judicial correction was made use of. Besides, the fiscal promoter, who receives the inquisitorial acts and an abstract thereof, needs an official statement that the judicial correction was duly served.[2] Hence we conclude that the Ordinary or his officialis must put the fact that judicial correction was made, on record, or give a written statement why, in virtue of can. 1948, it has been omitted. If the correction has proved fruitless, according to can. 1953, there is some similarity between the former injunction and our admonitions. As the violation of injunctions was proved by simply producing the writ and the record of its having been served, so may the violation or non-acceptance of correction be proved. But this requires either a written document or two witnesses, ecclesiastics or laymen, because at least moral certainty is required.[3]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The text says that the writ of complaint or accusation must be exhibited according to the rules for procedure

1 Instructio S. C. EE. et RR., June 11, 1880, nn. 6–8; Messmer, l. c., p. 144 f.

2 Instructio cit., n. 32 f.

3 Ibid., nn. 15, 16, 8.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

in general. These rules are contained in canons 1706–1710.

Here we may also draw attention to the fact that the term judge occurring in the singular by no means excludes what can. 1576 establishes concerning a board of judges, either three or five, as the nature of the case requires. For there can be no doubt that, if the case requires a collegiate body of judges, the whole trial would be null and void were this rule set aside.

After the bill of complaint has been presented, the next step is properly and legally to summon the accused or defendant. Here, again, canons 1711–1725 must be recalled. The accused, when duly summoned, will either appear or not appear. In the latter case he must be declared in contempt, according to can. 1842–1851. If he appears, he shall be granted a first hearing, as stated under can. 1742–1746, but the oath cannot lawfully be demanded of him. For the rest, says can. 1959, the rules laid down in the first section of this book, and for inflicting penalties the canons of the fifth book, must be observed.

There are two canons, one of which provides for the dignity of the sacred ministry and the other for a just procedure. If the crime is of a very serious nature, and the Ordinary is of the opinion that the faithful would be scandalized if the incriminated cleric should exercise the sacred ministry or perform spiritual functions or pious exercises or publicly receive holy Communion, he may, after having heard the promoter's advice, forbid the exercise of the sacred ministry or of spiritual ecclesiastical functions, and the public reception of Communion. This is a kind of suspension, but without penal character,[4] and therefore irregularity would not follow its

4 See can. 2222, § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

violation. Note the terms, spiritual functions and public reception, which indicate that neither temporalities nor secret reception are forbidden.

Justice and safety require that witnesses be not intimidated or bribed. Hence if the judge fears that this is being done, he may consult with the fiscal promoter, and then issue a decree commanding the defendant for the time being to leave the town or parish or to repair to a place assigned to him, and there remain under suspension. In the meantime, of course, if the defendant should be a pastor, a substitute must be furnished at his expense.

Title XX, On Matrimonial Trials, has been treated in Vol. V of this Commentary, pp. 400–439.

Title XXI, On Ordination Trials, has been explained in Vol. IV, pp. 550–557.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

PART II

THE PROCESSES OF BEATIFICATION AND CANONIZATION

INTRODUCTION

Since these processes are exclusively reserved to the Holy See and are conducted by the S. Congregation of Rites, which alone is competent in this important matter, it would be presumptuous to comment on these canons.[1] Therefore, a brief summary must suffice. The canons referring to the ordinary power of the local Ordinary will be pointed out as they occur. The Vicar-General needs a special mandate (can. 2002) for each and every case.

Canonization is an act by which the Sovereign Pontiff definitely and, we may add, infallibly declares an individual who died in communion with the Church to be a Saint and deserving of the veneration of the universal body of the faithful.

Beatification is a preliminary step to this solemn act and localizes, as it were, the veneration to the individual who is declared beatus.

The mode of procedure in both cases is twofold: viz.: per viam ordinariam non cultus or per viam extraordinariam casus excepti seu cultus,— the difference being that the ordinary method presupposes, before any discussion on the heroic virtues is admitted, that no veneration has been

1 Neither do we desire to copy the classical work of Benedict XIV, De Servorum Dei Beatificatione et Beatorum Canonizatione, 4 Vols.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

given to the person in question, or, if such was given per abusum, that it has been lawfully abolished. The extraordinary process consists in proving the existence of a standing public and ecclesiastical cult bestowed upon the person or persons in question. But each individual case must be individually examined, unless martyrs are under discussion who suffered in the same persecution and at the same place. An instance are our English martyrs, some of whom were put to death at the same time and in the same place.[2]

Historically the earliest was, of course, the veneration of the martyrs, two classes of whom are already mentioned in the fourth century: martyres vindicati et non vindicati, according as they were recognized or not by the ecclesiastical authority. St. Augustine briefly describes[3] the process of recognition. The bishop in whose diocese a martyr died, began the investigation by collecting the documents and forwarding them to the primate or metropolitan. The latter took cognizance of the acts, heard the bishop's view, and, after due deliberation, declared his own opinion as to whether or not the martyr should be publicly honored. It goes without saying that the veneration of martyrs as well as the celebration of their anniversaries were at first purely local festivals. But soon one church adopted the commemorations of another, and thus the festivals of the most distinguished saints came to be celebrated outside their own dioceses.[4] An investigation was required, so that the honors due to Saints were not given to heretics and schismatics.

In course of time there came to be associated with the martyrs certain holy confessors, that is, ascetae or 2 Cfr. Bede Camm., O.S.B., The English Martyrs.

3 Breviculus Collationis cum Donatistis, l. III, n. 11 ff. (Migne, P. L., 43, 629 ff).

4 Duchesne-McClure, Christian Worship, 1903, p. 284.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

solitary monks, whose life was regarded as a continuous martyrdom (St. Martin of Tours, St. Antony the Great, St. Simeon Stylites, etc.).[5] Whether this custom of venerating confessors was prevalent already in the fourth century or arose only in the eight, as some believe, is immaterial for our purpose.[6]

From the tenth century onward canonization came to be reserved to the Apostolic See, although some bishops continued to "canonize" until the pontificate of Alexander III (1159–1181), who issued the well-known Decretal on the Relics and Veneration of the Saints,[7] summarized in the words: "Without the permission of the Pope no one may be venerated as a Saint." Ever since this has been law in the Church, and subsequent papal constitutions[8] merely determined the method of procedure, which is now cast into legal form. We will give a brief conspectus:

4. Extraordinary trial per viam cultus or causus excepti.

5. Trial of Canonization.

From this sketch it will be seen that the activity of the Ordinaries is limited to the preliminaries of the ordinary trial.

The persons who hold special offices are (1) the actor, or petitioner, who may be any faithful Catholic or congregation (women must be represented by proxy); (2) the postulator, who promotes and treats the case at the competent tribunal; he must be a priest, either secular or religious, and have his residence in Rome; (3) vice-postulators are admitted, but require a special mandate.

One of the Cardinal-consultors of the S. Congregation of Rites, designated by the Pope, acts as cardinal relator.

5 Ibidem, and Le Ceremonie della Canonizzazione, Rome, 1897, p. 11 ff.

6 See Cath. Encycl., Vol. II, 365.

7 C. 1, X, III, 45.

8 Especially Urban VIII, "Coelestis Hierusalem," July 5, 1634; Bened. XIV, "Ad sepulchra," Nov. 23, 1741; also S. Rit. C., Instructio, 1878.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1. Persons at the Trial { Petitioners, Postulators, Cardinal Relator, Promotor fidei, Subpromotores, Notary, Secretary, Advocates

2. Evidence Required { Evidence in General, Witnesses and Experts, Documents.

3. Ordinary Trial of Beatification {
- a) Process to be instituted by the Ordinary iure proprio.
  - Inquiry into the writings,
  - Informative process
  - Inquest into non-cultus
  - Transmission of the acts.
- b) Introduction of the trial at the S. Congregation.
  - Revision of the writings
  - Discussion of the informative process
  - Discussion of the non-cultus
- c) Apostolic trial.
  - Instructio Processus
  - Validity of the Apostolic process
  - Heroic virtues or martyrdom, miracles.

The fidei promotor is appointed to defend the law and must always be summoned. The one employed by the S. Congregation is appointed by the Roman Pontiff, goes by the name of promotor generalis fidei, and is assisted by the assessor of the S. Congregation; he is called sub-promotor generalis fidei. But a promotor fidei may also be appointed by the Ordinary.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Besides these persons, a notary must be appointed from among the protonotaries apostolic for trials at the S. Congregation, and a diocesan notary for the inquiries to be made by the diocesan court. Religious cannot be notaries except in case of necessity, and in trials concerning their own order they cannot be notaries at all.

A secretary or cancellarius, advocates (counsels), and proctors must or may also be employed, but the latter two must be doctors in Canon Law and at least licentiates in theology.

The next title of the Code treats of evidence; first in general. The proofs must be full (plenae) and no others are admitted. Four witnesses are required to establish the fact that no worship was paid to the Servant of God; at least eight are necessary to prove the fame of his virtue, his martyrdom and his miracles. To give evidence of virtue and martyrdom eye-witnesses are required, and historical documents are admitted only as aids. However, in ordinary trials concerning ancient cases, and in extraordinary trials, hearsay and public rumor are admitted together with authentic contemporary documents.

Any one who was acquainted or familiar with the Servant of God, also his relatives and servants, including non-Catholics and infidels, may be admitted as witnesses; but the confessor, the postulator, the advocatus, and the judge are excluded.

All the faithful are obliged to submit whatever evidence they may have against the virtues, miracles, and martyrdom. Religious of both sexes must forward such information under seal directly to the Ordinary, and their superiors are not allowed to inspect such letters. The superiors should take care that their subjects present themselves for deposition, but should not compel them to testify favorably or unfavorably.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Experts are principally the physicians who examine miraculous cures; they must submit a written report under oath.

The documents demanded by the postulator must be presented in full and must contain a declaration as to their origin and authenticity. Extra-judicial documents furnish no proof of sanctity or martyrdom; neither do eulogies and funeral sermons, and much less testimonies solicited by the friends of the Servant of God, even though given by illustrious persons. Neither are historical accounts sufficient proof, per se, unless inserted in the acts proper.

Title XXIV details the process of beatification per viam non-cultus. The preliminary requisite is that of giving oath. This must be administered to the local Ordinary as well as to the Apostolic delegate, also to the judges, the promotor fidei, the notary, the secretary, and to the witnesses, experts, translators, and interpreters. The object of this oath is to insure strict secrecy and to induce all participants to do their duty conscientiously.

The postulator and vice-postulator must swear that they will tell the whole truth and employ no fraudulent means. The formula for this oath is a special one, prescribed by the S. Congregation of Rites.[9] [9] S. Rit. C., Oct. 5, 1678, § 1, n. 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER I

THE DUTIES OF THE LOCAL ORDINARY

Chapter I of this title (canons 2038–2064) refer particularly to the duties of the local Ordinary.

The petition for introducing a cause of beatification must be directed to the Apostolic See. But before it is admitted, the truth must be juridically established concerning the purity of doctrine of the deceased Servant of God, the fame of his sanctity, the virtues and miracles he wrought, the fact of martyrdom, and the absence of any peremptory obstacle; finally concerning the fact that no public worship has been paid to him. Hence the postulator must petition the Ordinary: 1. To see to it that the writings of the Servant of God be requisitioned, i.e., seized and examined; 2. To arrange the formal inquiry (processus informativus), into his fame of sanctity, his virtues in general, or his martyrdom, the cause of his martyrdom, and his miracles; 3. To institute an inquiry as to the non-cultus.

The competent Ordinary in this matter is he in whose diocese the Servant of God died, or in whose diocese the miracles have happened. If the Ordinary himself is related to the Servant of God, he shall delegate another to conduct the trial.

If an inquiry was instituted within the past thirty years into the fame of sanctity or martyrdom of the Servant of God, but was interrupted before the case was introduced at Rome, the Ordinary or his successor must inquire into the continuation of the fame.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The judge is the Ordinary himself, or a priest delegated by him. If a delegate conducts the trial, two other judges, taken from the college of synodal judges, must be chosen by the Ordinary. All this must be done by a formal decree.

The acts must be closed and sealed after every session.

ART. I

INQUIRY INTO THE WRITINGS OF THE SERVANT OF GOD

1. The term "writings" comprises all published and unpublished works, sermons, letters, diaries, autobiographies and manuscripts of every kind left by the Servant of God.

2. The faithful must be publicly exhorted to deliver up all his writings which they may have in their possession. If a religious is concerned this publication must be made in every religious house, and the superiors are obliged to see to it that it is properly done.

The promotor fidei shall see to it that the publication is also made in other places, where any writings may be found.

3. The Ordinary, urged by the promotor fidei, shall officially search for all such writings. If writings of the Servant of God are likely to be found in another diocese, he shall ask the Ordinary of that diocese to do the same, according to law (especially can. 2043) and forward anything he may find.

4. Those who wish to retain autographs of the Servant of God must allow the notary to take an authentic copy thereof, to be sent to the S. Congregation. Writings found in libraries or archives, whence they cannot be withdrawn, should be faithfully copied or photographed, and authenticated by the notary; if no copy can be obtained, the matter must be referred to the S. Congregation.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

5. The notary must carefully describe the number and quality of the writings, and the acts must be signed by the Ordinary or his delegate, and the promotor fidei, and sealed with the Ordinary's seal.

6. The postulator must give oath that he will make a careful requisition. If the Servant of God is a religious of a female institute, the Mother General must give the same oath and testify that all the writings of the Servant of God have been delivered up by her and her subjects.

7. In case of a martyr, the requisition may be made after the commission has been appointed by the S. Congregation.

Art. II

THE INFORMATION PROCESS

1. The processus informativus is to be instituted by the Ordinary. If it was not begun until thirty years after death of the Servant of God, no further procedure is allowed except after proof is furnished that the delay was not due to fraud, deceit, or culpable negligence.

2. The witnesses to be examined (can. 2019 f.) concerning the fame of sanctity, martyrdom, or miracles, are not required to testify specifically, but general testimony as to the growth and existence of the rumor among honest and serious persons is sufficient.

The witnesses are to be queried by the judge as to their knowledge of the life, virtues, miracles, and martyrdom of the deceased, how they obtained their knowledge, and whether it is of the nature of public rumor.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Then they must answer to the questions put by the promoter of faith.

3. The acts of the inquiry may not be closed before all the letters and papers of the faithful and the friends and acquaintances of the deceased (see can. 2023–2025) have been inspected by the promotor fidei. After all the testimony has been gathered the tribunal shall, upon having heard the promotor fidei, give notice to the postulator to bring forward whatever he has within a fixed term.

4. The judge, then, if the promotor fidei is satisfied, shall command the notary to publish the acts of the inquiry, which shall be copied by a clerk designated by the tribunal. The copy shall be in hand-writing (typewriting forbidden). It is to be collated with the original in the presence of one of the judges and of the promotor fidei, and then signed by the notary, the judge, and the promotor, and sealed.

After the collation, the original acts are closed and sealed, and placed in the diocesan archives, never to be opened without the permission of the Apostolic See. The abstract is closed and sealed with the seal of the Ordinary. The notary shall make two copies of it, one of which is to be forwarded to Rome, the other to be kept in the diocesan archives.

Art. III

INQUIRY INTO THE NON-CULTUS

Besides the two witnesses produced by the postulator, the tribunal shall introduce two more, who shall testify whether or not the Servant of God ever received a public worship. Besides, the tribunal shall carefully inspect his grave, the place (or house) where he lived and died,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and other places where indications of a cult may be suspected.

If the inquiry brings to light indications which show that public worship was paid, the promotor fidei must insist upon further investigation and the tribunal must give sentence as to the existence of such worship.

Art. IV

TRANSMISSION OF THE ACTS TO ROME

1. As soon as the Ordinary has obtained the writings, he must forward them to Rome, together with a judicial report as to the care with which the requisition was conducted. If other writings are found while the trial is going on in Rome, they must be immediately forwarded and inspected there before any further progress can be made.

2. The abstract of the informative process must be delivered by the Ordinary to the postulator, who shall send it to the S. Congregation. At the same time he (the postulator) shall forward letters from the judges addressed to the S. Congregation, and letters of the (diocesan) promotor fidei to the promotor general of faith, in order that the S. Congregation may be informed of the trustworthiness of the witnesses and the legal formalities of the acts. For this purpose the Ordinary shall also send a description or copy of the seal with which the abstract was sealed.

3. Finally the Ordinary shall have the postulator to send the complete result of the inquiry into the fact of non-cultus to the S. Congregation.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

INTRODUCTION OF THE CASE AT ROME

1. The first investigation to be made is the revision of the writings of the Servant of God. The revisors, chosen by the Cardinalis ponens, must be priests and doctors of divinity, and must give their opinion in writing. This examination is made to ascertain the purity of doctrine with regard to faith and morals and the virtues or defects that may be gathered from these writings. The final judgment, whether further procedure is permitted, lies with the Supreme Pontiff.

2. The second investigation concerns the processus informativus sent by the Ordinary through the postulator. The papers are to be examined materially and formally, and objections brought up by the promotor fidei generalis to be answered. The final judgment is pronounced at a congress of Cardinals, by the Cardinalis ponens, in the form of a doubt: "An signanda sit commissio introductionis causae in casu et ad effectum de quo agitur." If the answer of the Cardinals is favorable, a commission for the introduction of the case is appointed. After that the local Ordinaries can do nothing more without the permission of the S. Congregation, and it is strictly forbidden to call the Servant of God whose case has been introduced, "Venerable."

3. The third investigation regards the non-cultus,— whether the sentence of the diocesan court is to be ratified or not. If traces of worship have been found, the case is suspended until every vestige has been removed.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER III

APOSTOLIC TRIALS

If a decree of non-cultus has been issued, the Sovereign Pontiff is asked for the litterae remissoriales, which are given by the Cardinal Prefect and permit the trial to be instituted.

ART. I

INSTITUTION OF THE TRIAL

Two distinct trials are to be arranged: one concerning the fame of sanctity, miracles, or martyrdom; the other concerning the virtues and miracles in particular, or concerning the martyrdom. The first trial may be omitted if the Cardinal Prefect and the promotor fidei generalis deem it superfluous or inexpedient to inquire anew into the continued fame of sanctity.

Here the services of the Ordinary may again be required. If important eye-witnesses are in danger of death, or cannot be obtained at the time the trial concerning the virtues and miracles or the martyrdom is to be conducted, so-called litterae remissoriales are sent out to at least five judges (if possible, dignitaries), one of whom is the Ordinary, who shall act as presiding officer — now no longer iure ordinario, but delegato.

In the trial concerning the miracles an expert must be chosen. Besides the promotor fidei generalis shall by letters patent choose two subpromotors and send the interrogatories to these, who, however, shall not open the envelope until the examination begins. The delegated judge must present their credentials to the Ordinary.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

After all these preliminaries are completed, the presiding officer shall convoke the tribunal within at least three months after notice was received, and the trial should be finished within two years. Before it is closed, the remains of the deceased Servant of God must be juridicially examined. The acts must then be forwarded to Rome.

Art. II

JUDGMENT OF THE VALIDITY OF THE TRIAL

After these acts have been forwarded to Rome, the S. Congregation shall judge of the validity of the procedure, hear the promoter general, and finally give judgment. This is done in the presence of the Cardinal Prefect, the Cardinalis ponens, and three other Cardinals of the same Congregation, the Secretary, the protonotary apostolic, the promoter general, and the subpromoter.

Art. III

JUDGMENT ON THE HEROIC VIRTUES

The discussion of the virtues cannot be begun before fifty years have elapsed since the death of the Servant of God. The discussion concerns his practice of the theological virtues and of the four cardinal virtues (prudence, justice, temperance, fortitude), especially whether he possessed them in a heroic degree.

In the case of martyrs, the question is concerning the cause of their martyrdom, and the signs and miracles wrought. Difficulties are raised by the promoter general and answered by the advocates. Everything has to be taken down in writing. The Supreme Pontiff is informed of the result of the discussion, and afterwards a general congregation is held by the Cardinals of the S. Congregation, its prelates, officials, and consultors. The judgment whether the heroic degree of these virtues is verified, remains with the Pope, who commands the Secretary of the S. Congregation to issue a decree if the judgment was favorable. After the issuance of this decree the Servant of God may be called Venerable.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Art. IV

JUDGMENT ON THE MIRACLES

1. Besides heroic virtues or martyrdom, miracles wrought through the intercession of the Servant of God are required. As a rule two suffice, if testified to by eye-witnesses at the informative as well as at the Apostolic process. Three are demanded if eye-witnesses testify only at the informative trial, whilst at the Apostolic trial only hearsay evidence is presented; four are demanded if at both trials only hearsay witnesses and documents are produced.

2. Since miraculous cures are under discussion, two medical and surgical experts, who enjoy a good name and fame in their profession, must be consulted.

3. The discussion takes place at three distinct congregations, the last of which is a general one, held in the presence of the Sovereign Pontiff. After the miracles have been acknowledged, the doubt is formulated as follows: "An tuto procedi possit ad beatificationem Servi Dei." If the answer of the consultors and Cardinals is favorable, the Pope issues a decree to that effect.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE XXV

EXTRAORDINARY TRIAL PER VIAM NON-CULTUS OR CASUS EXCEPTI

1. A positive approbation of the Roman Pontiff may be asked for the cult bestowed on Servants of God who enjoyed a tolerated cultus after the pontificate of Alexander III (1159–1181) and before the time determined by the decrees of Urban VIII (1623–1644). It may be recalled that Urban VIII strictly forbade any authorization of public worship to be granted to anyone except such whose veneration had been established from time immemorial or at least a hundred years previous to the publication of the Constitution "Coelestis Hierusalem" (July 5, 1634), with the knowledge and approbation of the Apostolic See or the local Ordinary. The same constitution admitted as lawful a veneration of such Beati or Saints based upon a special indult or decree of the S. Congregation of Rites, or the writings of the Holy Fathers and other holy men.[1] Now Can. 2125 rules that, in order to obtain the approbation of the Roman Pontiff, a trial (processus)[2] is required. The regulations for this trial are laid down in the following canons. The competent Ordinary for conducting the inquiry is he in whose diocese the cultus was given, or the documents were found, or who has the right of preoccupation if several Ordinaries are concerned. There-

1 Cfr. Coll. P. F., n. 77.

2 We suppose, however, that the necessity of this trial must be understood in the light of the Const. of Urban VIII.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

fore the Ordinary who first summons witnesses is entitled to complete the preliminary trial.

2. The postulator then demands of the Ordinary:

a) to requisition the writings of the Servant of God, and

b) to institute an inquiry concerning the fame of sanctity and virtues, or martyrdom and miracles. This is required in order to answer the following questions: Whether there was in the place a constant and general fame and persuasion of the saintly life of the Servant of God, or of his martyrdom, and the reason thereof, also of the miracles wrought by his intercession; and whether this veneration still exists at present and in what manner it asserts itself.

3. Then the acts and results of the inquiry are sent to the S. Congregation, where the dubium is proposed: "An signanda sit commissio introductionis causae."

4. After this the litterae remissoriales are dispatched to the diocesan judges, in order to arrange for the (delegated) apostolic process on the casus exceptus, the result of which is again forwarded to Rome, where the final sentence is given, investigation into the virtues or martyrdom ordered, and finally, the so-called decree of equivalent beatification (aequipollens beatificatio) is issued.[3]

[3] Cfr. can. 1277.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XXVI

THE PROCESS OF CANONIZATION

1. A document establishing formal or equivalent beatification is required to introduce the process of canonization, or else an inquiry must be made as to the positive permission of the cult on the part of the Roman Pontiff.

2. To proceed to the canonization of a formally beatified Servant of God, two miracles wrought through his intercession after beatification, and three miracles in case the beatification was aequipollens, are required. The discussion of these miracles takes place as stated under beatification (can. 2116–2124).

3. Then the Roman Pontiff issues a decree of solemn canonization, the ceremonies and solemnities of which are those approved by the Roman Court.[1]

1 Booklets are generally distributed on such occasions, which give all the information as to the solemnities; these require costly preparation and for those admitted to witness them — experientiâ loquimur — a good dose of patience.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PART III

MODE OF PROCEDURE IN CERTAIN CASES AND THE APPLICATION OF PENALTIES

This last part of the Book on Ecclesiastical Procedure treats of seven particular cases which apparently call for a formal trial (strepitus iudicii) but in course of time have been made the object of special legislation, and hence are considered separately.

The legislator first lays down certain general rules, which apply equally to all seven cases, unless expressly modified, and then proceeds to determine each case in particular.

GENERAL RULES

CAN. 2142

In processibus de quibus infra, adhibeatur semper notarius, qui scripto consignet acta quae ab omnibus subscribi debent et in archivo servari.

CAN. 2143

§ 1. Quoties monitiones praescribuntur, hae fieri debent vel oretenus coram cancellario aliove officiali Curiae aut duobus testibus, vel per epistolam ad normam can. 1719.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Peractae monitionis eiusque tenoris documentum authenticum in actis servetur.

§ 3. Qui impedit quominus monitio ad se perveniat, habeatur pro monito.

CAN. 2144

§ 1. Examinatores et consultores ac notarius debent, interposito ab initio processus iureiurando, servare secretum circa omnia quae ratione sui muneris noverint ac praesertim circa documenta occulta, disceptationes in consilio habitas, suffragiorum numerum ac motiva.

§ 2. Si huic praescripto minime paruerint, non solum a munere amoveri debent, sed alia etiam condigna poena ab Ordinario, servatis servandis, plecti poterunt; ac praeterea damna, si qua inde secuta sint, sarcire tenentur.

CAN. 2145

§ 1. In iis processibus summarie procedendum est; at duo vel tres testes sive ex officio arcessiti sive a parte inducti audiri non prohibentur, nisi Ordinarius, auditis parochis consultoribus seu examinatoribus, existimaverit partes eos inducere ad moras nectendas.

§ 2. Testes et periti, nisi iurati, ne admittantur.

CAN. 2146

§ 1. A definitivo decreto unicum datur iuris remedium, idest recursus ad Sedem Apostolicam.

§ 2. Quo in casu ad Sanctam Sedem omnia acta processus transmittenda sunt.

§ 3. Pendente recursu, Ordinarius paroeciam vel beneficium quo clericus privatus sit, alii stabiliter conferre valide nequit.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1. In all these trials a notary should be employed. He should put the acts in writing and see to it that they are signed by all concerned and preserved in the archives. Although the text commands the participation of a notary, we hardly believe that the absence of a notary would invalidate the procedure. For the chief and essential point is the writing, which, as the "Maxima cura" clearly states, can be done by a clerk, called actuarius.[1] Those who have to sign their name to the documents or acts before they are filed away in the archives, are all who took an active or passive part in the trial.

2. Admonitions, if necessary, may be made orally or in writing. If they are administered orally, this must be done by the Ordinary in the presence of the chancellor, or some other official of the diocesan court, or two witnesses. If by letter, the latter should be registered and receipted for by the post office.[2]

Here the question arises whether the notary mentioned in can. 2142 is required. It appears to us that his presence is superfluous. For, as § 2 of canon 2143 states, the main point is to have a document to the effect that the admonition or warning was duly administered. This can be drawn up and filed equally well by the chancellor. If the notary were absent and inconveniences might follow, it would certainly be advisable and permissible to have the diocesan chancellor act as notary (can 372, § 3).

Whoever prevents the admonition from reaching him is regarded as having been admonished. Thus one who would refuse to accept a registered letter, of which the postmaster must have a receipt from the addressee, would be considered as having received it. The same is true

1 Pius X, Motu proprio of Aug. 20, 1910, § 10, n. 1 (A. Ap. S., II, 641).

2 See can. 1719.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

if he would not open the letter or destroy it unread.

3. Examiners, consultors, and the notary must at the very beginning of the trial promise under oath to keep the secret.[3]

This secret comprises all the knowledge gained in virtue of their office, especially secret papers, the debates or discussions held at the meetings, the number of the votes, etc. If any of these officials violate the law of secrecy, they must be removed from office. The Ordinary may also, servatis servandis, mete out other suitable or proportionate punishments. Besides these officials are bound to restitution if any damage results from the revelation of a secret.

The oath, says the text, must be given ab initio processus, which has been declared [4] to be the first session or meeting held for each and every case (but not every session of the same case). However, since the notary appears to act at the admonition in his official capacity for this whole procedure,[5] it would be more logical to refer the beginning of the trial to the administration of the canonical warning, at least for the notary. Of course, for a merely paternal admonition this oath is not required. The secret is the official one, or secretum commissum,

3 The formula for taking this oath (published in the A. Ap. S., IV, 142) is as follows: "Ego N. N. examinator (vel parochus consultor) synodalis (vel pro-synodalis) spondeo, voveo ac iuro munus et officium mihi demandatum me fideliter, quacumque humana affectione postposita, et sincere, quantum in me est, executurum: secretum officii circa omnia quae ratione mei muneris noverim, et maxime circa documenta secreta, disceptationes in consilio habitas, suffragiorum numerum et rationes religiose servaturum; nec quidquam prorsus, occasione huius officii, etiam sub specie doni, oblatum, nec ante nec post, recepturum. Sic me Deus adiuvet et haec sancta Dei Evangelia, quae meis manibus tango."

4 S. C. Consist., Feb. 15, 1912 (A. Ap. S., IV, 141): "singulis vicibus, in prima sessione, sub poena nullitatis actorum."

5 Maxima cura, can. 1, says: "Monitio . . . ut peremptoria sit et proximae amotionis praenuntia, fieri ab Ordinario debet, non paterno dumtaxat more, verbotenus et clam omnibus; sed ita ut de eadem in actis Curiae legitime constet."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

which is based upon an explicit or implied contract, and may safely be styled "privileged knowledge." Therefore, in general, it comprises every kind of knowledge gained in virtue of that office; especially, as the text says, all that proximately concerns the case under discussion.

That the obligation is a grave one (sub gravi) is evident not only from the importance of the official secret itself, but also from the penalties threatened to violators.

1.° The Ordinaries are commanded to punish and therefore are not at liberty to apply or not to apply this penal sanction. They must (debent) remove the transgressors. But when? As soon as the violation is proved, or as soon as the bishop is morally certain that an examiner or consultor or notary has revealed a secret. No formal procedure is required,[6] otherwise an indefinite proceeding would ensue.

2.° Other penalties may be inflicted. Here no obligation is stated, but it is left to the prudent judgment of the Ordinary. In case he should decree further penalties, besides removal, he is bound by the conditions of common law required for inflicting certain punishments.[7] This is the meaning of servatis servandis.

3.° There is a moral obligation to indemnify the injured party. If we say moral obligation, we do not mean to exclude justice, nor to deny that juridical means could be employed, but use the phrase in order to convey the idea that conscience itself dictates the obligation. The amount of indemnification is guaged by the damage done. The manner of indemnification depends on the circumstances of each case. Broadly it may be said that the Ordinary should decide upon the measure and mode of 6 F. Cappello, De Administrativa Amotione Parochorum, 1911, p. 86 f.

7 Cfr. can. 2222 f.; also 2291, 2297.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

indemnification. If a criminal case ensues, it must be determined according to can. 1935 ff. All of which goes to show that officials should keep the secret strictly, in order not to injure anyone's good name, and avoid being impeached.

4.° Can. 2145 rules that summary proceedings should be employed in the trials now under discussion. However, two or three witnesses, either called officially or by the party, may be admitted, unless the Ordinary, upon consultation with the consultors or the examiners, should come to the conclusion that these witnesses are simply brought to delay the trial.

What summary proceeding involves is indicated in can. 1840 f. It is evident that, though it is a summary trial, the following canons must be followed. Witnesses and experts must all be sworn in, otherwise they cannot be admitted. It is not stated what kind of witnesses are to be called. Therefore can. 1756–1758 should be consulted. It is but natural that the witnesses mentioned in can. 2143, § 1, should be of clerical rank, although laymen (sexus virilis) are not debarred, provided they are trustworthy and of good reputation.

5.° No appeal, but only a recourse to the Holy See (S.C. Concilii) is open from a definitive sentence in any of these trials. If recourse is had, all the documents must be forwarded to Rome. This recourse must be treated like an appeal, of which can. 1881 says that it should be made within ten days by notifying the judge who has given the sentence. Pending the recourse, the Ordinary cannot validly confer the parish or benefice of which the clergyman has been deprived on another, except temporarily. Therefore no permanent appointment can validly be made pending a recourse. This follows from the very nature of the case.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XXVII

PROCEEDINGS FOR THE REMOVAL OF IRREMOVABLE PASTORS

Our text is part of the well-known decree "Maxima cura," which was issued by the S. Consistorial Congregation, Aug. 20, 1910, at the special request of Pius X. The full title of said decree is: "Decretum S. C. Consistorialis de amotione administrativa ab officio et beneficio curato."[1] The formal law established by this decree changed the former procedure in removing pastors from their parishes. The intention of the lawgiver was, on the one hand, to formulate more accurately the already existing but scattered decisions which in the course of a century had emanated from the Roman Court for a more expedient and less obnoxious removal of inefficient pastors, and, on the other hand, to safeguard and promote the welfare of the Church (salus reipublicae suprema lex est).[2] There is no doubt that the so-called desservants, who were introduced by the organic articles of Napoleon I, influenced the ecclesiastical legislation in changing the application of former laws. For these were based on the old view of the beneficiary system, which regarded a pastor as so closely connected with the benefice itself, that it seemed a hazardous task to remove him. It is quite true that some allusions to a change or transfer

1 Cfr. A. Ap. S., II, 636 ff.
2 See the preface to the decree; also Hilling, Die Amtsenthebung der Pfarrer im Verwaltungswege, Mainz, 1911, p. 2 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

from one place to another are found in the Decretals; but a permanent removal, such as the "Maxima cura" and our Code contemplate, cannot be discovered in the old law.[3]

This is quite intelligible if we recall that canonists established two kinds of perpetuity: one called objectiva, attached to the benefice, and the other one styled subjectiva, following the person of the holder. This double perpetuity and the feudal idea of a benefice rendered a pastor irremovable, unless criminal procedure or privation of benefice was set in motion.

A decisive step, which paved the way for the present discipline, was taken by the Council of Trent, when it established a kind of temporary removal by giving the bishops power to appoint vicars or coadjutors to illiterate and inexperienced pastors.[4] A further development was brought about in the nineteenth century, in consequence of the appointment, in France and Belgium, of desservants, who were pastors according to ecclesiastical law, but according to the Napoleonic Code mere ministers dependent on the civil prefects. It cannot be denied that conditions have changed decidedly and that the "salus reipublicae" really requires a more up-to-date method of providing competent and efficient pastors, making the office more prominent than the benefice. Hence it is not surprising that the German Bishops prepared a postulatum at the Vatican Council, asking for an involuntary transfer of pastors, or a dismissal with a sufficient pension, if the pro-synodal examiners pronounced a sen-

3 C. 5, X, III, 19. Card. Gennari (Sulla privazione del beneficio e sul processo criminale dei chierici, 1905, p. 215 f.) thinks he has found allusions to administrative removal, but the decisions of the S. C. C. up to the middle of last century only mention transfer or privation (see Richter, Trid., p. 119). "Potuit prius inveniri," a famous Roman theologian would say.

4 Sess. 21, c. 6, de Ref.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tence of unfitness against them.[5] Although this postulatum could not be acted upon on account of the troublesome events in Rome, the Codification Commission in 1904 took up the subject. The result of its debates was laid down in the "Maxima Cura," a part of which has entered the Code. The decree also applied to the United States, as was formally declared to the late Apostolic Delegate, Msgr. Falconio, on March 13, 1911, by the Consistorial Congregation.[6]

It is not necessary to defend this new legislation. Only one remark may be added. The pastors have no reason to complain of the change, because the law guarantees orderly procedure and requires canonical reasons, which the bishops are not allowed to overlook or stretch beyond due limits, thereby binding the Ordinaries to the common law and protecting the pastors against arbitrary removal. The bishops cannot complain, because they have the law on their side and are sustained in the exercise of their pastoral right. The faithful have no grounds for complaint because the supreme law, namely, their own welfare, is fully safeguarded and promoted.

Note that this removal must not be confused with privation from office or benefice, because privation is strictly an ecclesiastical penalty, which requires the formalities of criminal procedure, and therefore presupposes a crime in the proper sense of the word, proved and declared.

REASONS FOR REMOVAL

CAN. 2147

§ 1. Parochus inamovibilis a sua paroecia amoveri potest ob causam, quae ipsius ministerium, etiam citra

5 Coll. Lac. V, II, 875; Granderath-Kirch, Geschichte des Vatik. Konzils, 1903, I, 444.

6 Eccl. Review, Vol. 44, 590.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

gravem suam culpam, noxium aut saltem inefficax reddit.

§ 2. Hae causae sunt praesertim quae sequuntur:

1.° Imperitia vel permanens infirmitas mentis aut corporis, quae parochum suis muneribus rite obeundis imparem reddit, si, iudicio Ordinarii, per vicarium adiutorem bono animarum provideri nequeat ad normam can. 475;

2.° Odium plebis, quamvis iniustum et non universale, dummodo tale sit, quod utile parochi ministerium impediat, nec brevi cessaturum praevideatur;

3.° Bonae existimationis amissio penes probos et graves viros, sive haec oriatur ex levi vivendi ratione parochi, sive ex antiquo eius crimine quod nuper detectum eximatur iam poena ob praescriptionem, sive ex facto familiarium et consanguineorum quibuscum parochus vivit nisi per eorum discessum bonae parochi famae sit satis provisum;

4.° Probabile crimen occultum, parocho imputatum, ex quo Ordinarius prudenter praevidet magnam in posterum oriri posse fidelium offensionem;

5.° Mala rerum temporalium administratio cum gravi ecclesiae aut beneficii damno, quoties huic malo remedium afferri nequeat sive auferendo administrationem parocho, sive alio modo, quamvis aliunde parochus spirituale ministerium utiliter exerceat.

An irremovable pastor may be removed from his parish for any reason which renders his ministry harmful, or at least inefficient, even though there be no grievous fault implied on his part.

What an irremovable pastor is has been stated in can. 454, to which we may add the decree of the S. C. Con-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sistorialis, Aug. 1, 1919, where it is stated that three things are required to establish a parish: (a) a decree or order of the Ordinary assigning the boundaries, (b) a parochial residence, and (c) a sufficient endowment for the maintenance of the pastor and of divine worship. But to make a parish irremovable, it is furthermore required that a declaration be made to that effect, at least negatively; for the Ordinary may, for just reasons, declare it to be a removable parish. This declaration is absolutely necessary, because otherwise, according to can. 454, § 3, the parish is presumed to be an irremovable one.[7] We do not, however, wish to deny that a former declaration made according to the IIId Plenary Council of Baltimore (n. 32 ff.) would be sufficient.[8] Hence where there are irremovable pastors to the amount of one-tenth of all the pastors of the diocese, this custom may be followed, unless the Ordinary wishes to declare still other parishes as irremovable, which he may do without asking the Holy See.

The text says that the removal may be made for reasons which do not imply grievous guilt (citra culpam gravem). Guilt presupposes a transgression, and grievous guilt a violation of a serious law, and, since we are speaking of the law, it means an external violation, no matter what the theological guilt may be. Here the difference between removal and privation as stated above becomes clearly manifest. All the five reasons stated under § 2, really may involve either no guilt at all or only a slight fault, although some may entail grievous guilt.

However, these reasons must bear upon the sacred ministry, or rather, they must affect it in such a way that

[7] A. Ap. S., XI, 346.
[8] See Vol. II, p. 519 f. of this Commentary.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

its exercise becomes either hurtful or ineffective (noxium vel saltem inefficax). These two adjectives, which substantially occur in the "Maxima Cura," are a general indication of the five following reasons. "Hurtful" involves more of personal cooperation, whilst "inefficient" or "ineffective" points to facts over which the pastor has no control, or in regard to which he might plead "not guilty."

§ 2 of can. 2147 then enumerates (not taxative, but demonstrative), five reasons which chiefly (praesertim) may necessitate a removal. That the enumeration is to be taken demonstrative only, i.e., as a proximate, not exclusive enumeration, the word praesertim sufficiently proves.[9] These reasons are:

1. Inexperience or permanent mental or bodily infirmity which render the pastor incapable of discharging his obligations properly, provided, however, that the Ordinary is convinced that the welfare of the souls in his charge cannot be provided for by the appointment of a coadjutor, according to can. 475.

This reason comprises the first three of the "Maxima cura," which document is, therefore, helpful for the interpretation of the Code.

a) Imperitia is not identical with ignorance, for the latter signifies defect or lack of knowledge, whilst inexperience rather means incapacity for, or inability to exercise, the sacred ministry. A priest may be a good theologian, but a poor manager. Ignorance is now-a-days hardly conceivable among those who have passed "laudabiliter" through a regular seminary course. Hence imperitia rather concerns the method of handling a parish; lack of tact and awkwardness in the confessional or pulpit, in dealing with the parish officials, etc. This greatly depends on the place and surroundings.[10] A boorish priest may be a scandal to city people, but create little disturbance in a distant country place. To inexperience, of course, belong ignorance of the language of the country, and an offensive lack of familiarity with pastoral and moral theology.

[9] The reasons in "Maxima Cura" were understood taxative.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

b) Mental infirmity here comprises all kinds or forms of insanity, which is described in "Maxima cura" as incurable, or, at least, of the kind which is always apt to recur, and which causes loss of esteem and authority even after the recovery of the pastor. Serious fatuity, stupidity, or weakmindedness, also belong hither.

c) Bodily infirmity includes all diseases which are of a serious and lasting character. Just how long an infirmity, either mental or bodily, has to last in order to render one unfit for the sacred ministry, is not stated in our text, except by the word permanens,[11] which may be rendered by habitual, durable, or incurable. A physician's verdict is required, but we do not, of course, exclude a miraculous cure.

Very noticeable is the clause added to all three reasons: if a coadjutor should not be able to provide for the welfare of the souls. An accurate rule that would tell us when the weal of the parish requires the appointment of a new pastor in casu, cannot be established. For much depends upon the qualities of the coadjutor and the condition and attitude of the parish. At any rate, since the clause sets up this condition, the Ordinary must try a coadjutor.

2. The second reason is popular hatred, even though unjust and not general, provided it is such as to prove

10 Hilling, l. c., p. 12.

11 Can. 155 and 465 prescribe a six months' term for provision, which, however, may be prolonged in case of pastors.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

an obstacle to the pastor's useful ministry and is not likely to cease within a short time. Odium is more than aversion, and must manifest itself by outward signs, for instance, insults, demonstrations, injuries done to parish property. Serious and prolonged newspaper attacks may also betray a sufficient degree of hatred. Such hatred is unjust if the pastor has given no plausible or solid reason for it; it is just, if the pastor has caused the hatred, either by imprudence or imputable sinful provocation. The text admits any kind of hatred. It is not universal if only a portion of the parish is hostile. One or two families, or a few individuals should not cause alarm if the parish is of any size. However, one influential family with a widespread relationship may create a rather extensive hatred. In that case the condition added in our paragraph would solve the question.[12] For this hatred is supposed to impede the useful exercise of the sacred ministry and to be of some duration. The sacred ministry would be impeded if the reception of the sacraments and attendance at divine service would decrease considerably, if the financial condition of the parish would be seriously imperilled and factions would arise. The duration would be of from six months to a year. It may be added that the hatred must be directed against the person of the pastor, not against religion as such.

3. The third reason is loss of esteem among righteous and serious-minded men. Esteem is paid to the office and authority of the pastor, and the loss of it necessarily renders the exercise of the sacred ministry ineffective, if not detrimental. The persons whose esteem the pastor has lost must be men of character, not garrulous women, even though of the "upper" class.

12 Cappello, l. c., p. 37.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The text then states how this loss may be brought about.

a) It may arise from the pastor's conduct. The phrase, "ex levi vivendi ratione parochi," is wider than the corresponding passage of the "Maxima cura," which reads: "sive haec procedat ex inhonesta aut suspecta vivendi ratione parochi." The Code simply speaks of levity of conduct, which must be interpreted in the light of canons 138, 140, and 142.[13] Custom and actual conditions should also be taken into consideration.

b) The loss of esteem may be caused by the belated discovery of a former crime which is no longer punishable by reason of prescription.[14] Concerning prescription of crimes and criminal action see can. 1703–1705. The civil-criminal law, too, must be consulted; for the priest's good name is here concerned.

c) Lastly, a pastor may lose the esteem of his people through the conduct of his dependents and blood relations who live with him. This is a rather obscure text. The reading itself is not quite certain, whether familiarium or familiarum; the edition of Gasparri reads familiarium,[15] which includes servants who live in the parsonage. Consanguinei here includes blood relations and affines. Therefore if a factum — which is a very wide term — of a scandalous nature has been perpetrated by one of these persons, which would compromise the pastor, the obnoxious person or persons should be dismissed from his service or household. But it may be 13 See Vol. II, p. 86 ff. of this Commentary.

14 Whether this goes back to the time before ordination is not clearly stated, but seems implied, because the loss of esteem may follow even such crimes as were committed before ordination if the pastor is well known in the place.

15 There seems little doubt that the correct reading is familiares, not familiae, because the latter are included in the term consanguinei.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

that dismissal would cause greater disturbance, in which case removal might be decreed.

4. The fourth reason is a probable crime imputed to the pastor, which, though secret, in the bishop's judgment may create great scandal among the faithful. On crime and its public or occult nature see can. 2195–2197. The text adds "probabile," a probable crime, i.e., one that has at least the semblance of having been committed by the pastor and must be imputed to him. A great deal depends on the persons who know about the crime. Then the offence the people would take at such a discovery must be really great, and not be limited to the one or other fanatic or puritan. Some people have a very strange idea of the Decalogue. But where honesty and justice are involved, people are justly sensitive. The judgment must be left with the bishop.

5. The fifth reason is faulty administration of the temporalities, to the great damage of the church or benefice. This is culpable if it involves a misappropriation or embezzlement of public funds, i.e., funds belonging to the church or diocese, diocesan collections, etc., or risky speculations, which are a sort of illegal gambling. It may not involve moral fault, but simply result from financial incapacity or inability to keep books and collect the revenues of the church or benefice. The faultiness of the administration is to be reckoned according to the gross amount of the revenues involved and the amount lost, for the text says, "cum gravi damno."

But this reason is a limited one, as removal is indicated only if no other remedy is left to counteract the evil and the temporal administration cannot be taken away from the pastor in some other way. Hence the bishop may entrust the administration of the temporalities of the parish to the trustees, or to the curates or assistants or alio modo, by giving the delinquent pastor practical lessons in administration or sending him an auditor once in a while, teach him the necessity of keeping his books properly. All these means are applicable even in cases where the pastor performs his spiritual duties properly. For temporal loss often entails spiritual disadvantages, since it may burden the church or even bring law suits upon the pastor, the trustees, or the diocese.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

INVITATION TO RESIGN

Can. 2148

§ 1. Quoties, prudenti Ordinarii iudicio, in unam ex causis de quibus in can. 2147 parochus incidisse videatur, ipsemet Ordinarius, auditis duobus examinatoribus et veritate gravitateque causae cum eis discussa, parochum scripto vel oretenus ad paroeciae renuntiationem intra certum tempus faciendam invitet, nisi agatur de parocho vitio mentis laborante.

§ 2. Invitatio, ut acta valeant, continere debet causam quae Ordinarium movet et argumenta quibus ipsa innititur.

Can. 2149

§ 1. Si parochus intra praestitutos dies nec renuntiet nec dilationem postulet neque causas ad amotionem invocatas oppugnet, Ordinarius, postquam constiterit et invitationem ad renuntiandum, rite factam, parocho innotuisse et ipsum quominus responderet legitime impeditum non fuisse, eum statim a paroecia amoveat, quin teneatur praescripto can. 2154.

§ 2. Quod si non constet de superius indicatis duobus adiunctis, Ordinarius opportune provideat aut iterando invitationem ad renuntiandum aut prorogando tempus utile ad respondendum.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

After setting forth the reasons which may advise a removal, the Ordinary is told how to proceed. First he shall invite the delinquent pastor to resign. This invitation may produce no effect, because the pastor does not answer, or it may produce the desired effect, i.e., cause him to resign.

If the pastor refuses to resign and offers reasons for his refusal, the way is opened to legal procedure proper, as seen in can. 2151 ff.

1. Whenever the Ordinary is convinced that a pastor is guilty of mismanagement for one of the reasons stated in the preceding canon, then he himself, or his Vicar-General,[16] must proceed as follows:

a) He must call in two of the examiners, either synodal or pro-synodal, and hear their advice, though he is not bound by their consent (can. 105, n. 1.°).

b) With these two examiners he should discuss the truth and seriousness of the charges made against the pastor, because discussion may remove doubts and clear up the case.

c) After the discussion he shall invite the pastor to resign. This invitation may be made orally or in writing, but should always be accompanied by the indication of the term within which the resignation is expected. Although our text does not prescribe that the oral invitation be made in the presence of the chancellor, or of some other diocesan official, or of two witnesses, yet, since it amounts to an admonition, it seems to us that can. 2143, § 1, 2 must be applied.[17] A written invitation to resign must be sent by registered mail.

d) This invitation may be omitted only in case the 16 According to the "Maxima cura," can. 32, the Vicar General needed a special mandate; but the Code omits this condition.

17 "Maxima cura," can. 10, § 1, strictly required it.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

pastor suffers from a mental defect which in the "Maxima cura" (can. 9) is simply styled "insanity." But the term vitium mentis is somewhat broader than insanity. It may include habitual melancholia (this is now regarded by scientists as a form of insanity) and even the so-called determinatio ad unum, which is a mental attitude rendering the person incapable of reasoning in any other way than along the lines of a certain preconceived idea. However we believe that the legislator means insanity in all its species. Of course the Ordinary may not presume that such a condition exists, but must have definite proof, either in the form of a medical certificate or from trustworthy witnesses.

e) In order to render not only the invitation itself, but all the following acts, juridically valid, the Ordinary is bound to state in the invitation the reason that prompted him to issue the invitation and the evidence which supports the reason.

The "Maxima cura" contains some more elaborate instructions, which, though omitted in our text, do not militate against it, and may, therefore, find a place here; with due regard to the fact, however, that they do not affect the validity of the proceedings. If the crime that prompted the invitation is secret (crimen occultum), and the invitation is in writing, the reason for the invitation is to be stated only in general terms,[18] for instance (can. 2147, § 2), that the respective pastor has exercised the sacred ministry less effectively and usefully than was expected. Then when the pastor appears personally, the specific reason and the evidence may be communicated to him orally, in the presence of one examiner, who at [18] The reason for this general statement is to keep the crime secret and to prevent the impeached pastor from devising excuses or destroying evidence; Hilling, l. c., p. 23.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the same time acts as secretary, and takes down the minutes. In communicating the evidence orally, great care must be taken to keep secret the names of the accusers and witnesses, especially if these persons demand secrecy, or if circumstances are such that they have reason to expect vexations. Papers referring to the crime should not be communicated in writing whenever their communication is apt to cause scandal to the faithful, or breed quarrels and contentions because other persons are involved.

But even the oral communication of such papers must be made very cautiously if inconvenience is to be feared.

As may be seen, these observations of the "Maxima Cura" are intended to safeguard the good name of others and to avoid unnecessary publicity.

2. If the pastor ignores the bishop's invitation to resign within the appointed time,[19] i.e., if he neither resigns, nor asks for delay or dilatory terms, nor rebuts the reasons alleged,— what is the Ordinary to do? He must make two inquiries, one touching the juridical formalities, and the other concerning a mere fact; to wit, he must inquire whether, and be morally certain that,

a) The invitation to resign has been properly made and reached the pastor and that

b) The pastor had no lawful excuse for not answering the same.

As to a), it is evident that if the oral invitation was made according to can. 2143, § 1, 2, there is no difficulty to prove the juridical fact and formality; the same is true if it was made in writing, i.e., by registered letter with return receipt. Therefore we believe that what was said above, under can. 2148, should be adhered to.

19 "Maxima cura," can. 10, § 4, grants ten days; but the Code leaves it to the Ordinary to fix the time.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

As to b), a legitimate excuse for not answering might be advanced, for instance, absence, sickness, or ignorance of the invitation. However, the last-named reason could hardly be accepted in case of a registered letter.[20] Neither should the bishop be too hasty in refusing plausible excuses, for accidents sometimes happen over which individuals have no control. But if the bishop is really satisfied in conscience that the invitation was duly made and reached its destiny, and that no legitimate excuse was offered for not answering it, he may immediately proceed to remove the pastor, and if he does so (can. 2152, § 2), should inform him of his decision. The pastor on his part, because of his contempt or stubbornness, forfeits the prerogatives granted in can. 1254.

If, on the other hand, either the formal invitation was defective, or the pastor advanced a lawful excuse for not answering it, the Ordinary shall make opportune provisions. These consist in either repeating the invitation to resign or prolonging the time for answering the charges or reasons given in the invitation, either orally or in writing.

RESIGNATION ACCEPTED

CAN. 2150

§ 1. Si parochus paroeciae renuntiet, Ordinarius paroeciam ex renuntiatione vacantem declaret.

§ 2. Potest vero parochus, loco causae ab Ordinario invocatae, aliam ad renuntiandum afferre sibi minus molestam vel minus gravem, dummodo vera et honesta sit, ex. gr., ut obsequatur Ordinarii desideriis.

§ 3. Renuntiatio fieri potest non solum pure et

20 Though it may happen that interested persons in the household of the pastor signed the receipt and kept or destroyed the letter.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

simpliciter, sed etiam sub conditione, dummodo haec ab Ordinario legitime acceptari possit et reapse acceptetur, et firmo praescripto can. 186.

If the pastor resigns his parish, the Ordinary shall declare the same vacant by resignation. This fact must be expressly mentioned because of the formalities required for the bestowal of the vacant parish on another, according to can. 184–187, and also on account of can. 1485. Formerly no office or benefice made vacant by resignation could be bestowed on relations of the resignans; [21] but the Code is silent on this condition.

A pastor who is asked to resign, may do so for another reason than that set forth by the Ordinary; this reason may be less offensive or irksome or aggravating, but it must be true and honest. Such a reason is, "to obey the wishes of the Ordinary." He may also simply say: "For reasons of my own," or "For the welfare of the parish," etc.

The resignation may be made purely and simply, or conditionally, provided the Ordinary is entitled to accept, and does accept, the conditions. A resignation is pure and simple if no simoniacal or other condition enters into the transaction; conditional, if a clause is attached in the act of resignation. Such a condition would be present if the pastor resigned in favor of a certain priest, which is inadmissible.[22] Neither can any resignation be admitted on the condition of regressus, ingressus, or aggressus (see can. 1486). Hence there remains only exchange (causa permutationis). A resignation conditioned upon this clause is called resignatio sub pensione.

Both kinds are tacitly admitted in this case by reason

21 Wernz, Ius Decret., II, n. 499.

22 See the commentators on lib. , tit. 9, Decretal., v. g., Reiffenstuel, Wernz, l. c., II, n. 493 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of can. 2154 and under the conditions set forth in this title. What other conditions might enter it is hard to say, except they be temporary, for instance, to leave the pastor in his place for a certain time. But the Code has touched even this possibility in can. 2156.

Resignation, lastly, to be valid, must be made according to can. 186, i.e., either in writing or orally, in the presence of two witnesses, and be accepted by the Ordinary.

REBUTTAL OF THE PASTOR

CAN. 2151

Parochus, si oppugnare velit causam adductam in invitatione, potest dilationem ad probationes afferendas postulare, quam Ordinarius pro suo prudenti arbitrio concedere potest, dummodo ne sit cessura in detrimentum animarum.

The pastor may oppose the reason alleged in the invitation if he is convinced that it has no foundation except gossip. In that case he is entitled to demand dilatory terms — the extent of which is not determined in the Code [28] — in order to prepare his defence. Whether and how long delay may be granted depends on the Ordinary's judgment, which, however, should be guided not only by charity towards the pastor, but also and chiefly by consideration for the bonum commune.

PROCEEDING OF THE ORDINARY

CAN. 2152

§ 1. Rationes a parocho contra invitationem adductas Ordinarius, ut valide agat, auditis iisdem

28 "Maxima cura," can. 12, allowed from 10 to 20 days.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

examinatoribus de quibus in can. 2148, § 1, perpendat, approbet aut reiiciat.

§ 2. Decisio, sive affirmativa fuerit sive negativa, parocho significetur decreto.

CAN. 2153

§ 1. Contra decretum amotionis potest parochus intra decem dies recursum interponere apud eundem Ordinarium, qui, ne invalide agat, debet, auditis duobus parochis consultoribus, novas allegationes ab eodem parocho intra decem dies ab interposito recursu producendas, simul cum rationibus primo allatis, examinare, approbare aut reiicere.

§ 2. Parochus potest eos testes inducere ad normam can. 2145, § 1, quos prima vice se inducere non potuisse probaverit.

§ 3. Decisio decreto nota parocho fiat.

CAN. 2154

§ 1. Amoto parocho Ordinarius, examinatoribus vel parochis consultoribus, qui partem habuerunt in amotione decernenda, in consilium adscitis, pro viribus consulat sive translatione ad aliam paroeciam vel assignatione alius officii aut beneficii, si ad haec idoneus sit, sive pensione, prout casus ferat et adiuncta permittant.

§ 2. Ceteris paribus, in provisione favendum magis renuntianti quam amoto.

1. The pastor then shall duly prepare his defence, for which purpose he may produce two or three witnesses, according to can. 2145, and also papers referring to the case. Here, of course, much depends on the reason that prompted the invitation. In case of mental or bodily infirmity, the physician's verdict should be procured under affidavit. Concerning the hatred of the people, we believe local inspection, either by the Ordinary or by the examiners, would be the proper way, otherwise the pastor or bishop might have to call the whole parish. As to the loss of esteem, the men who testify to it must be examined as to their character, and it is also necessary to prove the approximate number of those in whose eyes the pastor's reputation has greatly suffered. In case of an occult or secret crime, the main investigation should turn about the probability of divulgation and the means of proving it. In that case a clever and conscientious lawyer and a detective might render good services. Finally, in case of mal-administration, the account books may be submitted to an auditor assisted by the trustees and the diocesan board. We add that, if the matter is of a delicate nature, little writing should be done and the examination carried on with as few witnesses as possible.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2. After the defence has been produced, or if it is made orally, during the hearing, the Ordinary, for valid procedure, is bound to call the two examiners, in order to hear their advice. As said above, the examiners should, or at least may, be present when the oral defence is made. After that the pastor, who may be represented by proxy,[24] shall retire, in order to permit the Ordinary and the two examiners to discuss the case freely.

The decision is left entirely to the Ordinary, who is not bound by the consent, much less, of course, by the advice, of the examiners. We draw special attention to 24 "Maxima cura," can. 18, 2, admits proxy, who, however, must be a priest approved by the bishop for that purpose.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

this fact because the "Maxima cura" (can. 19) requires secret balloting, which is no longer needed now.

The result of the bishop's decision may be either positive or negative, i.e., he may either accept the defence of the pastor as sufficient to clear him or he may reject it as insufficient. In either case the decision must be communicated to the pastor in the form of a decree. The text may be usefully complemented from can. 20 f. of the "Maxima Cura," which says that if the decree is negative, the reason for removal may be stated in general terms, as, e.g., the welfare of souls. Special or particular reasons may be alleged if the Ordinary deems it expedient and feasible; but mention must be made of the invitation tendered to resign, of the counterplea of the pastor, and of the vote of the examiners. However, this last addition must now be formulated differently, for instance, having heard the advice of two examiners according to can. 2152, § 1. An affimative decree, i.e., one admitting the defence of the pastor, must also be communicated, but in this case the Ordinary should not omit to add wholesome admonitions and precepts, which may serve for future procedure.

3. The next stage in the procedure is a possible recourse on the part of the pastor. Note the term recursus, which is not equivalent to appeal, and consequently does not suspend the effect of the decree. The proceeding is as follows:

a) The recourse against removal must be lodged within ten days from the date of receiving notice of the decree.

b) The recourse is to be presented to the same Ordinary who issued the decree of removal. If he should have gone out of office in the meantime, either by death, resignation or transfer, etc., the recourse may be sent to the vicar-capitular (administrator). However, we believe that in this case the equitable time should be suspended until the new Ordinary's arrival, unless the scandal is too great.[25]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

c) Then the Ordinary grants the pastor another ten days, within which he may produce his new defence. Thus the pastor has twenty days in all from the date when he receives the notice of his removal, in order to prepare his second defence.

d) The Ordinary must call in two pastors who are consultors,[26] in order to proceed validly in the examination of the new allegations. These new allegations may be accompanied by new witnesses, whom the pastor could not produce at the first trial. But the pastor must prove that the new witnesses could not be brought to the witness-stand before. To prove that, it would be sufficient for the witnesses to affirm it, because they are under oath according to can. 2145.

Together with these two consultors the Ordinary shall discuss the case, as he did before with the examiners. However, in order fully to enlighten the consultors, the allegations and depositions made in the first pleading in presence of the examiners must again be examined. The consultors have no decisive vote.

e) Then comes the decision, in the form of a decree, wherein the presence of the consultors together with the reasons in general (as above) is mentioned.

f) Finally this decree must be communicated to the pastor.

3. Supposing now that the decree insisted on removal and was duly notified to the pastor, it appears but logical that the parish is declared vacant, at least de iure; al-

25 Our view is based on can. 436: sede vacante nihil innovetur.

26 Concerning these, see can. 385 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

though no declaration to that effect is required by the Code. But there can be no doubt that from the moment the pastor has received the decree of removal he is no longer pastor. The consequences are too serious not to be mentioned. The parochial rights, the ordinary jurisdiction for hearing confessions, the claim to the revenues cease from the moment of removal.[27] Therefore, in order to remedy these inconveniences, the decree of removal should contain a clause to the effect that the pastor is left in the enjoyment of all his pastoral rights until the new pastor or temporary vicar has arrived, or until further notice. In case of doubt or probable error, can. 209 may be applied. This premised, after the removal has been decreed and the decree communicated, the Ordinary must proceed as follows:

a) If the invitation was accepted or obeyed after the first plea for defence, without recourse, the examiners must be called to a meeting, the purpose of which is to provide for the removed pastor;

b) If recourse was had, and a second defence is therefore required, the consultors must be called in for the same purpose;

c) The debate concerns the mode of providing for the removed pastor, either by transfer to another parish, or by appointment to another office or benefice, provided he is fit for any of these places, or by a pension. The correct mode must be determined by the nature of the case and the circumstances.

d) All other things being equal, one who has resigned is to be favored more than one who was removed.

The Code leaves it to the prudent judgment of the Ordinary how to provide for the removed pastor. Yet, 27 See can. 462 f.; can. 873, § 1; can. 1095 can hardly be applied here.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

though not juridically, at least morally, he is bound by various conditions. For besides the advice of the examiners or consultors he should follow this dictate: "pro viribus consulat," as far as lies in his power, he should make provision for the pastor who has been removed. He must take into consideration the fitness of the priest for the respective place (parish, office, benefice). Furthermore he should weigh the case decided, because the five reasons advanced in can. 2147 are not all of the same nature (prout casus ferat). Besides, the circumstances of the parish, of the pastor (his health, good name, etc.), and of the diocese should also be taken into account (prout adiuncta permittant). After having weighed all these conditions, if there are several competitors for a parish, office or benefice, one who has resigned is to be preferred to one who was removed: ceteris paribus, or, as the "Maxima cura" (can. 257, § 3) says, "in pari conditione." For if the resignee is not fit for the place, the Ordinary cannot conscientiously assign it to him.

The next question that arises is, whether the bishop is bound to give the resignee a better parish than the one he has resigned. But what is a better parish? The former law considered a parish with a richer income (pinguiores reditus) a better parish. The "Maxima cura" (can. 27, § 1) simply distinguishes between parishes of inferior and superior rank or order,— which admits of a wide interpretation and the play of personal tastes. For to some a small city parish seems preferable to a large country parish. Therefore, with the exception of a cathedral or collegiate parish, we believe that the old view of a richer income is still a safe index of superior rank. Besides, the irremovable character should be considered. This premised, the answer to the foregoing question is that a pastor who has resigned voluntarily for reasons which he himself has not brought about (for instance, on account of hatred), should be promoted to a better parish, or one of equal rank and income, provided he is fit for it, and the place is open, or the Ordinary can give it to him without inconvenience. Another question connected with this canon is this: Has a resigned or removed pastor a right to demand a pension instead of accepting another parish, or office, or benefice? in other words: Is he entitled to choose between a parish, office, or pension? Neither the wording of the "Maxima cura" [28] nor the text of the Code grants such a right. Of course, if the bishop leaves him the choice, the pastor is entitled to choose what he pleases. But there are very few, if any, dioceses in our country which could furnish pensions sufficient to provide for all cases of resignation or removal. If, then, the pastor refuses another place, offered to him by the Ordinary, the latter is not obliged to provide him with a pension.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Concerning pensions attention must be called to can. 1429, which is not affected by canon 2154.

AFTER REMOVAL

CAN. 2155

Negotium novae provisionis parochi amoti potest Ordinarius sive ipso amotionis decreto sive postea, quamprimum tamen, expedire.

CAN. 2156

§ 1. Sacerdos a paroecia amotus debet quam primum liberam relinquere paroecialem domum, et omnia quae

[28] Thus Hilling, l. c., p. 32.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ad paroeciam pertinent novo parocho vel oeconomo ab Ordinario interim deputato tradere.

§ 2. Si autem de infirmo agatur qui e paroeciali domo sine incommodo nequit alio transferri, Ordinarius eidem relinquat eius usum etiam exclusivum, eadem necessitate durante.

Provision for the removed pastor may be made in the decree of removal itself or, at least, should be made as soon as possible thereafter. The "Maxima cura" (can. 28) permitted insinuation of the provision to be made in the invitation to resign, and pending the case of removal. These two points are not mentioned in the Code. But one thing stated in said decree, viz., that the question of removal and the question of provision should not be mixed up, in order not to impair the welfare of souls, applies also to the decree of removal. And here again attention must be drawn to the necessity of mentioning the duration of parochial rights and duties.

After removal, what has the removed pastor to do? He must, as soon as possible, leave the parochial residence and hand all the belongings of the parish to the new pastor or administrator pro tempore, appointed by the Ordinary. Omnia quae ad paroeciam pertinent signifies all the parish books, all the account books, and all the utensils or sacra suppellex[29] belonging to the parish. Concerning the furniture of the residence this is generally provided by the parish and therefore must be left in the residence. However, if there should be a piece of family furniture to which the pastor has a claim, he may take it along; also the books which he bought out of his patrimony or salary.

[29] Chalices or vestments which were given to the pastor for personal motives, intuitu personae, belong to him and may be taken away.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Next the Code provides for the case of a sick priest who can not be lodged elsewhere. This evidently supposes either a bedfast or crippled or paralytic person, who cannot conveniently be transported to another place. If he can travel, the favor extended here cannot be claimed. This favor consists in that the Ordinary should leave the sick priest in the (if necessary exclusive) enjoyment of the pastoral residence as long as need requires. Of course in that case the new pastor or administrator would have to look out for another residence within the parish limits, unless the two priests would agree to live peacefully in the parochial residence.

If a pastor who has been removed and told to leave the pastoral residence, obstructs the execution of the bishop's decree by having recourse to a higher ecclesiastical court, he must remember that this recourse has only devolutive, not suspensive, force,[30] and that, consequently, he must leave his residence. If the pastor should be tempted directly or indirectly to impede the execution of the episcopal decree by having recourse to the civil power, he should read can. 2334, which renders him liable to excommunication specially reserved to the Apostolic See. Besides, our civil law holds that a clergyman is entitled to the possession of a parsonage only as long as his connection with the congregation continues, and that one who is deposed (removed) but nevertheless stays in possession of the parsonage, becomes liable for rent.[31]

EXCURSUS ON DISABLED PRIESTS' FUNDS

The question of making provision for priests in case of removal is intimately connected with the general problem of raising funds for the support of disabled priests.

30 See Can. 2153, as compared with can. 1889, § 1.

31 Zollmann, American Civil Church Law, 1917, p. 342.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

It is not an easy task to solve, and the Code makes no attempt to solve it; but it is worth while to compare some texts which bear on the subject. For the rest we refer to other sources.[32]

1. It must be remembered that every clergyman is incardinated in a diocese, to which he belongs and to which he is (can. 111) under obligation. A clergyman receives his support, not precisely in virtue of the office he holds or the services he renders to the diocese at large, but for the attention he gives to a determined function, or pastoral office, or benefice. This is expressed by the well-known adage: "Beneficium propter officium." From this it follows that the bishop cannot be held responsible for the salary or support of a pastor. Attempts made to that effect have met with no favor in our civil courts.[33] And if the bishop cannot be held 32 See Eccl. Review, Vols. XIX, 645 ff., XXIII, 458 ff., XXIV, 20 ff., 339 ff.

33 K. Zollmann, American Civil Church Law, 1917, p. 350, says: "It has been held that the relation between bishop and priest is not that of hirer and hired, but rather that of superior and inferior agents of the same church. The bishop is the priest's superior and according to the established order of things in the economy of church government regulating the degrees of subordination and the methods of administration, it is his province to designate the place for the priest to exercise his functions and to prescribe, under certain limitations, the rules for his guidance and control. To hold the bishop personally liable at law for the priest's services would be as unjust as holding the general agent of a railroad company liable for the pay of the railroad employees engaged by him in the course of his agency. Men are constantly going into positions under appointments by superior agents who are universally understood not to assume any personal liability by such appointment. Since there is no contract relation between priest and bishop after the priest has been assigned to a charge, there can be none before such assignment. Whatever duty a bishop may have to appoint a priest to some charge is a religious duty only. For its performance or nonperformance he is answerable only in foro conscientiae or to his ecclesiastical superior. It is a matter in which the ecclesiastical discretion of the bishop is, and must be the determining factor. In the exercise of that discretion he is answerable only to the laws of the church. If for a breach of this clearly ecclesiastical duty there should be a remedy by law, it must follow that a man may have an action for the responsible for the salary of a working priest neither can he be obliged to provide personally for relief or support in case of disability.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2. How then may funds be raised to support disabled priests? On the one hand there is the universal conviction, emphatically expressed in the well known decretal of Innocent III, that affliction is not to be added to affliction but rather pity to be shown.[34] The tender solicitude of the Church has always been shown in the succor granted to the helpless and the poor. How much more it should be applied to the "portio Domini" needs no proof. Where the cooperation of the State could be invoked, the difficulties were to a great extent solved by pensions. But where Church and State are completely separated, the ecclesiastical authorities had necessarily to call upon the clergy and the faithful to mitigate the lot of helpless priests. The Third Plenary Council of Baltimore enacted that each bishop should establish a fund for the maintenance of indigent priests under his jurisdiction. This fund was to be raised either by a tax levied upon the parishes, or, if these were al-refusal of a clergyman to baptize him. If there is a contract duty on the part of the bishop to assign a priest to a charge, it must follow that there is a similar obligation on the part of the priest to accept such charge. No one will contend that a bishop has any such civil right. The priest, so far as the courts are concerned, can lay down his office and its duties at pleasure. For doing so he can be visited only with ecclesiastical censure and such punishment as the church canons prescribe. The priest, so far as the courts are concerned, is thus completely without remedy as against his bishop. The bishop may appoint him or not in his discretion. He may, after he has appointed him, assign him to another charge. He may even enjoin him from exercising priestly functions and remove him absolutely without trial, and the courts will be in no position to afford him any relief. Since he has no contract with his congregation and with his bishop, the question arises whether he has any remedy against the church as a whole. Even this must be answered in the negative. The church, even if it is capable of being sued, has assumed no legal liability for his support."

[34] C. 5, X, III, 6.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ready too heavily taxed, on the clergy, who were to contribute pro rata from their personal income. A third method also was suggested, viz., that the clergy organize themselves into a mutual benefit society, administered by the members themselves, with the bishop as ex officio president.[35] The two first methods may work well in larger dioceses, but smaller dioceses are hardly able to raise sufficient funds for the purpose.[36] There a provincial system might supply the shortcomings of the individual dioceses. More efficient, and, we believe more pleasing to sensitive priests and more businesslike, is the third method suggested by the Council, which entitles each priest to a share in the general fund in case of disability, regardless of his personal revenues. The only drawback we can see in this system consists in the danger of unjust distribution and of fostering an indolent, and perhaps insolent, spirit among the clergy. However, the constitutions or by-laws could be framed in such a way as to counteract these evils.

3. The next question is: What does the Code say in this matter? We could find only three canons that bear on the subject. They are 1429, 1505, and 2154.

Can. 1429, as explained in Vol. VI, permits the Ordinary to impose a pension upon parochial benefices or parishes, in favor of the pastor or assistants of the same. The amount of this pension is not to exceed one-third of the net revenues of the parish.

Canon 2154 permits a pension to be paid to a removed or resigned pastor.

Canon 1505 empowers the Ordinary to impose a charitable subsidy on all beneficiaries, secular as well religious, provided the needs of the diocese impel him [35] Acta et Decreta Conc. Plen. Balt. III, n. 71.

[36] Am. Eccl. Rev., XXIII, 473.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google thereto and the taxation be extraordinary and moderate.

Of these texts two only refer to pastors and curates of parishes, because the pension is intended only for these. A pastor emeritus or a vicarius emeritus may be benefited by such a pension, but regular funds destined for all disabled priests cannot be construed into these two canons.

Can. 1505 is broader because the condition "dioecesis necessitate impellente" undoubtedly exists when there is question of providing for needy priests. But the exactio is to be only extraordinaria. This would seem to exclude regular yearly contributions. The most a private interpreter could admit is that a contribution could be demanded whenever the diocesan treasury is at a very low ebb. When this condition exists, all the beneficiaries, but not the parishes, may be taxed, and religious who hold parishes in the diocese would have to contribute their share to this fund.

4. This observation calls for another. Suppose the case of a clerical aid society, of the type found in some dioceses. Is the Ordinary or the Board of such a Society entitled to tax religious entrusted with congregations in the diocese? We hardly believe so, for, first of all, whatever is not connected with the care of souls is withdrawn from the episcopal jurisdiction,[37] and consequently the bishop is not entitled to exact contributions which have nothing to do with the congregation itself. Secondly, it does not appear just that religious, who are taken care of by their respective communities in case of disability, should be forced to contribute to a fund from which they derive no benefit. This reason, of course, holds only if the religious claim no subsidy from the aid society in case of sickness or other impediment.

5. Another question is, whether the bishop is entitled

37 Cfr. can. 533, § 1, n. 4; can. 630, § 1, 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to levy a contribution on the personal income of (secular) priests under his jurisdiction to meet the expenses of a clerical aid fund? The Third Plenary Council of Baltimore, in the text already quoted (n. 71), not only permits, but obliges Ordinaries to establish a fund for the support of indigent priests. The Code, while it does not favor extraordinary charitable subsidies except moderately and extraordinarily, does not prohibit the institution of benevolent societies. Since the Code does not explicitly provide for disabled priests — a canon to that effect would have been opportune — it is certainly left to the Ordinaries to supply this defect; because the Ordinaries are allowed to legislate within the range of common law, except where they are explicitly prohibited.[38] Hence the right of making laws for the purpose of raising clerical funds and distributing them justly cannot be denied to the Ordinaries. And if this is true of such laws in general, it must also apply to by-laws or constitutions that may be necessary for the just or equitable administration of these funds. Thus diocesan statutes concerning prompt payment, or the prorating of contributions, or conditions for receiving aid, are entirely justifiable.[39] The diocesan statutes should contain the by-laws of such aid societies, in order that they may become diocesan laws. The by-laws themselves should clearly set forth when and under what conditions a disabled priest is entitled to draw on the diocesan fund or the Clerical Aid Society. Priests who have means of their own from patrimonial or other revenues should be excluded from the privilege of receiving such aid, which is destined for those unable to procure a decent support.[40]

38 Bened. XIV, De Syn. Dioec., XIII, 1, 3; Am. Eccl. Rev., XXIV, 26.

39 Such statutes exist in various dioceses; see Am. Eccl. Rev., XXIV, p. 29 f.; p. 339 ff.

40 Concerning culpably — ex delicto — disabled priests we refer to

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

6. A last question: May the Ordinary command the congregations or parishes of his diocese to contribute to the clerical aid fund? He may do this in a friendly, but not in a domineering or threatening way. The reason lies in can. 1505 f. and can. 1186 and 1297. If the legislator would have the Ordinaries use their power in favor of the repairs required for the cathedral and other churches by persuasion rather than coercion, it is certainly not too much to argue a pari. The same rule of mitigation and moderation occurs in can. 1297 with regard to the sacra utensilia. Of course, we do not deny that Ordinaries may have collections taken up at irregular intervals for the purposes of a clerical relief or aid society.

In conclusion attention may be drawn to life insurance for the clergy, which may be handled, not only by responsible private companies, but also by provincial or interprovincial clerical companies, under the supervision of the ecclesiastical authorities.

can. 2303, § 2. The legislator there tells the Ordinary that he should provide for an indigent, though deposed, clergyman, lest he should have to beg, to the disgrace of the clerical state. But the obligation is merely one ex titulo caritatis.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XXVIII

PROCEDURE IN REMOVING REMOVABLE PASTORS

CAN. 2157

§ 1. Parochus quoque amovibilis a sua paroecia amoveri potest ex iusta et gravi causa ad normam can. 2147.

§ 2. Ad parochos religiosos quod attinet, servetur praescriptum can. 454, § 5.

CAN. 2158

Si Ordinarius aliquam ex his causis adesse existimaverit, parochum paterne moneat atque hortetur ut paroeciae renuntiet, causam indicans, quae paroeciale ipsius ministerium fidelibus noxium aut saltem ineffi-cax reddit.

CAN. 2159

Firmo praescripto can. 2149, si parochus renuat, rationes in scriptis reddat, quas Ordinarius, ut valide procedat, perpendere debet una cum duobus examinatoribus.

CAN. 2160

Si, auditis examinatoribus, Ordinarius allatas rationes legitimas non iudicaverit, paternas iteret hortationes ad parochum, comminata amotione, si intra

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

congruum definitum tempus paroeciam sponte non dimittat.

CAN. 2161

§ 1. Expleto praefinito tempore, quod pro sua prudentia prorogare potest, Ordinarius decretum amotionis emittat.

§ 2. Parocho autem renuntianti aut amoto providere tenetur ad normam can. 2154–2156.

The procedure for removing a removable pastor has been modified. The modification consists in the provision that no formal invitation to resign is required and no legal rebuttal or recourse against the decree of removal is admissible. Hence the consultors need not be called in, but the cooperation of the examiners is sufficient.

1. The removal of a removable no less than of an irremovable pastor requires a just and grave cause, i.e., one of those stated in can. 2147.

If a religious pastor is to be removed, the procedure is very simple. See can. 454, § 5, where it is said that pastors belonging to a religious community may be removed ad libitum either by the local Ordinary or by the religious superior. The one has only to notify the other of the removal, without stating the reasons. Recourse to the Holy See is admissible, but with devolutive effect only.[1]

2. If the local Ordinary is convinced that one of the reasons stated under can. 2147 can be advanced against a removable pastor, he shall paternally warn and exhort the latter to resign his parish, and state the reason why his pastoral ministry has become detrimental or at least useless. No special formality is required for this ad-

1 Cfr. Vol. II, p. 520 f. of this Commentary.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

monition, which is expressly styled paternal, i.e., not canonical. But a certain and fixed term must be given the pastor for answering the Ordinary's demand.

If the warning is given in writing, it should be sent by registered mail, because can. 2149 also applies in this case.

3. If the pastor does not act upon being thus warned, he may be removed at once without the benefit granted by can. 2154. If he answers negatively, i.e., if he refuses to resign, he must state the reasons for his refusal in writing. The Ordinary shall then discuss these reasons with two examiners. This discussion is required for valid procedure.

4. If the Ordinary, after having heard the advice of the examiners — which he is not bound to follow [2] — deems the reasons brought against the removal groundless or unlawful, he shall repeat the exhortation to resign under threat of involuntary removal in case the pastor refuses to leave the parish within the time appointed.

5. After the expiration of this term (which may, however, according to the prudent judgment of the Ordinary, be prolonged) the Ordinary shall issue the decree of removal. This, of course, must be intimated to the pastor. This is the last phase and requires no recourse and no calling in of the consultors. But provision is to be made just as for irremovable pastors, and therefore canons 2154–2156 apply to this case.

2 See can. 105.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XXIX

PROCEDURE IN THE TRANSFER OF PASTORS

CAN. 2162

Si bonum animarum postulet ut parochus a sua, quam utiliter regit, ad aliam paroeciam transferatur, Ordinarius eidem translationem proponat ac suadeat ut eidem pro Dei atque animarum amore consentiat.

CAN. 2163

§ 1. Parochum inamovibilem Ordinarius invitum transferre nequit, nisi speciales facultates a Sede Apostolica obtinuerit.

§ 2. Parochus vero amovibilis, si paroecia ad quam non sit ordinis nimio inferioris, etiam invitus transferri potest, servatis tamen praescriptis canonum qui sequuntur.

CAN. 2164

Si parochus consilio ac suasionibus Ordinarii non obsequatur, rationes in scriptis exponat.

CAN. 2165

Ordinarius, si, non obstantibus allatis causis, iudicet a proposito non esse recedendum, debet, ut valide agat, super eisdem causis audire duos parochos consultores, et cum eisdem perpendere adiuncta in quibus versatur tum paroecia a qua, tum paroecia ad quam, et rationes quae translationis utilitatem aut necessitatem suadent.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 2166

Si, auditis parochis, Ordinarius translationem peragendam censeat, paternas exhortationes iteret ut parochus voluntati sui Superioris morem gerat.

CAN. 2167

§ 1. His peractis, si parochus adhuc renuat et Ordinarius adhuc putet translationem esse faciendam, parocho praecipiat ut intra certum tempus ad novam se conferat paroeciam, eidem in scriptis significans, elapso praefinito tempore, paroeciam, quam in praesens obtinet, ipso facto vacaturam esse.

§ 2. Hoc tempore inutiliter transacto, paroeciam vacantem declaret.

By transfer is understood an exchange of parishes made with the consent of the legitimate superior. Reasons, at least in general, are required for lawful transfers, because they are generally looked upon as odious, unless they involve promotion.[1] The Code admits the welfare of souls (bonum animarum) as a valid reason. Our text says that the competent superior may decree a transfer, and draws a distinction between irremovable and removable pastors. Besides, as admitted by the old and the new law, there is a difference between voluntary and involuntary transfers, and transfers to a better or to a worse parish. It may also be noted that the practice of the Roman Court concerning transfers extends almost exclusively to the so-called desservants of France, who were considered rectores ad nutum amovibiles.[2]

1. The Code states that if the welfare of souls requires

1 Cfr. Vol. II, p. 167 f. of this Commentary; A. S. S., XIX, 53 ff.

2 The decisions quoted by Card. Gasparri regard France and confirm what we stated in the beginning of can. 2147.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

that a pastor be transferred from a parish which he has governed with success, to another parish, the Ordinary shall propose the matter to the pastor and persuade him to accept the transfer for the love of God and of souls. The reason [3] for the transfer is here supposed to exist in the parish to which (ad quam) the pastor is to be transferred. It may be that this parish is financially or spiritually neglected, or that factions or parties are tearing it up to the detriment of souls.[4]

2. The Ordinary, however, must duly consider the character of the pastor, whether he is removable or irremovable, and whether he is willing or not to accept the transfer. For the Ordinary (iure ordinario) has no right to transfer an irremovable pastor against his will to another parish. To do this, special faculties are required from the Apostolic See. Whether our Ordinaries have obtained such faculties, is unknown to us; the former formularies contained no such faculty.[5] The Ordinary should beware of making threats, because a transfer made under threats, or by deceit, would be rescindible by a sentence of the diocesan court.[6] Therefore the Ordinary is not allowed to conceal the real condition of the parish to which an irremovable pastor is to be transferred, though he may emphasize its advantages.

3. A removable pastor may be transferred to another parish even against his will, provided the parish to which he is to be transferred is not of too low a rank, and pro-

[3] Cfr. cc. 37, 39, C. 7, q. 1; c. 5, X, VIII, 19, mentions utilitas et necessitas.

[4] S. C. C., March 27, 1886 (A. S. S., XIX, 53).

[5] Not even the faculties (Formula III, maior) granted lately to the Vicars Apostolic by the S. C. P. F. contain such a faculty. The faculties just mentioned were kindly communicated to us for inspection by the Rt. Rev. Leo Haid, O. S. B., Vicar Apostolic of North Carolina, for which favor we wish to express our heartfelt thanks.

[6] Cfr. can. 103; A. S. S XI, 387.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

vided the Ordinary proceeds according to the following canons.

What inferioris ordinis means has been touched upon above. The inferiority may be owing to a smaller income or to less importance or smaller size. The pastor, as stated before, may have his own ideas about the superiority or inferiority of a parish. If he accepts the parish offered to him no further formality is required, except that he declare his willingness to accept, in order that the Ordinary may declare the parish vacant,— but not by resignation. For it is a transfer, not a resignation.

4. If the removable pastor thinks he has reasons for not following the advice of the Ordinary, then

a) He must state in writing the reasons for not accepting the transfer, e.g., his health, his mental qualities, his financial condition, etc.

b) The Ordinary shall then ponder the reasons given and consider the status of the parish. If, after due deliberation, he insists upon the transfer, he is bound, for valid procedure, to hear the opinion of two pastors-consultors on the reasons advanced, on the condition of both parishes (viz., the one from which and the one to which the removable pastor is to be transferred), and, finally, on the reasons of necessity or utility which apparently demand a transfer.

Here may be added some remarks as to the conduct of the pastor while the case is pending. He should keep silent and above all not stir up or arouse the congregation, or create factions, or, what is still worse, have recourse to civil authority in order to bring pressure to bear upon the Ordinary.[7] Such methods are not only [7] S. C. C., March 23, 1878; March 27, 1886 (A. S. S., XI, 382 ff.; XIX, 53 ff.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

unbecoming to a priest, but may exasperate the lawful authority and cause scandal.

c) After having heard the consultors, if the Ordinary still insists on the transfer, he may renew his paternal (not canonical) admonition to move the pastor to acceptance.

d) If this proves fruitless, and the Ordinary remains unmoved in his former decision, he shall command the removable pastor (parocho praecipiat) to repair to the new parish within a certain time. This is a formal precept, to be served in writing, wherein the Ordinary declares that, after the expiration of the time granted the pastor for going to his new parish, the parish which he holds at present will ipso facto be vacant. But a reasonable time should be given. Twenty-four hours is not considered reasonable.[8] Ten days is more acceptable.

e) After the expiration of the appointed time, if the removable pastor has not gone to the parish assigned to him, his old parish must be declared vacant.

Here the procedure ends. No recourse is mentioned. It would be useless to have recourse to the Holy See, because it would cause expenses without any practical result. This whole legislation is modern and, as stated, has grown out of the conditions of the present time.

[8] See A. S. S., XI, 387.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE XXX

PROCEDURE AGAINST CLERGYMEN TRANSGRESSING THE LAW OF RESIDENCE

CAN. 2168

§ 1. Parochum, canonicum aliumve clericum, qui residentiae legem, qua ratione beneficii tenetur, negligat, Ordinarius moneat, et interim, si agatur de parocho, eiusdem impensis provideat ne salus animarum detrimentum patiatur.

§ 2. In monitione Ordinarius recolat poenas quas incurrunt clerici non residentes itemque praescriptum can. 188, n. 8, et clerico significet ut intra congruum tempus ab eodem Ordinario definiendum residentiam instauret.

CAN. 2169

Si intra praestitutum terminum clericus nec residentiam instauret nec absentiae causas afferat Ordinarius, servato praescripto can. 2149, declaret paroeciam aliudve beneficium vacare.

CAN. 2170

Si clericus residentiam instauret, Ordinarius, non modo debet, si absentia illegitima fuerit, ei infligere privationem fructuum pro tempore absentiae, de qua in can. 2381, sed potest etiam, si casus ferat, pro gravitate culpae eum congrue punire.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 2171

Si clericus residentiam non instauret, sed absentiae causas afferat, Ordinarius, accitis duobus examinatoribus et institutis, si opus fuerit, opportunis investigationibus, videre debet num causae sint legitimae.

CAN. 2172

Si, auditis examinatoribus, Ordinarius censeat adductas causas non esse legitimas, rursus clerico praefigat terminum intra quem redire debet, salva semper privatione fructuum pro tempore absentiae.

CAN. 2173

Si parochus amovibilis intra praescriptum tempus non redierit, Ordinarius statim procedere potest ad paroeciae privationem; si redierit, Ordinarius det ei praeceptum ne rursus discedat sine scripta sua licentia sub poena privationis paroeciae ipso facto incurrenda.

CAN. 2174

§ 1. Si clericus, qui beneficium inamovibile obtinet, residentiam non instauret, sed novas alleget deductiones, Ordinarius eas cum eisdem examinatoribus ad examen revocet ad norman can. 2171.

§ 2. Si nec ipsae legitimae habitae fuerint, posthabitis quibusvis aliis deductionibus, Ordinarius clerico praecipiat ut intra tempus praescriptum vel iterum praescribendum redeat sub poena privationis beneficii ipso facto incurrenda.

§ 3. Si non redeat, Ordinarius eum beneficio privatum declaret; si redeat, Ordinarius idem det praeceptum de quo in can. 2173.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 2175

Neutro in casu Ordinarius beneficium vacare declaret, nisi postquam, perpensis una cum examinatoribus discessus rationibus quas clericus forte allegaverit, eiusdem Ordinarii licentiam in scriptis ab eodem clerico peti potuisse constiterit.

The obligation of a cleric to reside at the place of his office or benefice, if this requires permanent residence, was set forth in previous canons.[1] Here the Code lays down rules for the treatment of those who violate this divine-human law. It is evident that a canon who has the obligation of choir service or other residential duties cannot be punished for a lawful absence of three months each year. The pastor may enjoy a two months' vacation, during which he should not be unnecessarily vexed by a recall from the Ordinary. Outside this lawful absence pastors and canons, unless urgent need calls them away, must remain within the limits of their parishes, though during a few days of the week they may sometimes absent themselves for good reasons, provided they stay at home on Sundays and holydays of obligation. Unqualified, however, and liable to the penalties enacted in the following canons, would be regular absence from the parish on all weekdays, as if the pastor were pastor only on Sundays. The Code provides the Ordinary with rules that should be observed in proceeding against clergymen who infringe upon the laws of residence.

1. The first question naturally turns upon the persons whom the law intends. They are (a) pastors, i.e., all who go by this name, either removable or irremovable, incumbents of true or holders of quasi-parishes, also those who govern parishes as vicars of chapters or religious corporations; for instance, the religious called expositi, for these are bound by the same obligations as other pastors.[2] Temporary substitutes or oeconomi are bound by the same duty.[3] Also the coadjutors of disabled pastors, if they take the place of the pastor in all things.[4]

1 Cfr. Vol. II, p. 546 f. of this Commentary.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

b) Canons of cathedral and collegiate chapters must observe the law of residence if they are obliged to daily choir service and are not allowed to engage a substitute.[5]

c) Alius clericus, qui residentiae legem ratione beneficii tenetur, or, in other words all clergymen possessing a residential benefice, i.e., one which, either by its nature, or by reason of a charter or particular law, requires residence.[6] Our assistants or curates (cooperatores) are not obliged to residence by reason of the beneficiary character of their office, because the notion of benefice can hardly be applied to the same, but can. 476, § 5 obliges them to reside within the parish to which they are attached, according to the diocesan statutes and praiseworthy custom. There can be no doubt whatsoever that a priest incardinated and engaged at a certain church as assistant to the pastor, must stay at that church according to the orders of his Ordinary.[7] Rural deans, who are not at the same time pastors, must nevertheless reside in the territory of their deanery.[8]

2. The procedure against clerics who seriously transgress the law of residence, is as follows:

a) The Ordinary shall first give a canonical warning or admonition and in the meantime, in the case of a negligent pastor, provide as well as he can for the welfare

2 Can. 471, § 4.
3 Can. 473, § 1.
4 Can. 475, § 2.
5 Can. 418 f.
6 Can. 1411.
7 S. C. C., May 8, 1756 (Richter, Trid., p. 207, n. 5); Aug. 4, 1880 (A. S. S. XIV, 113 ff.).
8 Cfr. can. 448, § 2; also consultors, see can. 425, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of his subjects. The expenses of this temporary provision must be borne by the careless pastor.

If we say, a canonical warning, not merely a paternal admonition, it is because the warning here intended has all the features of a canonical basis of procedure. Therefore it should be given in writing, or in presence of two witnesses, according to can. 2143, § 1. The canonical nature of the warning also appears from its contents. For in it the Ordinary must (a) mention the penalty (loss of income according to the time of unlawful absence),[9] (b) recall to the cleric's mind that contumacious absence means tacit resignation of the office or benefice he holds,[10] and (c) appoint a certain time within which the cleric should again take up his residence.

b) The admonition may or may not produce the desired effect. Three hypotheses are conceivable: Either the cleric does not heed the warning at all, or he takes up his residence without further ado, or he give reasons for his absence.

(1) If the cleric neither takes up his residence nor gives reasons for his absence within the term appointed in the admonition, the Ordinary shall declare the parish or benefice vacant.[11] However, to do this validly, he must first make certain that the canonical warning was duly served and that there was no reason for not answering.

(2) If the cleric returns to his residence, the Ordinary must,— if the absence was entirely unlawful (of which the Ordinary is the judge),— deprive him of a pro rata share of his income, and may also inflict other punishments proportionate to the guilt incurred. The pro rata

9 Can. 2381.
10 Can. 188, n. 8.
11 Trid., sess. 6, c. 2; sess. 23, ce. 1, 16, de ref. (Richter, Trid., l. c.).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

share of the income is to be reckoned by the time of the unlawful absence. Thus, if the yearly salary is $1000, and the unlawful absence was six months, the fine would be $500. However, this would be excessive. For even a delinquent clergyman, as long as he is incardinated and has not forfeited every claim to a decent livelihood, must be allowed the necessary support. Therefore he may subtract the expenses for his maintenance during the six months, say about $250 or $300, and, as required by can. 2381, give the rest to the Ordinary, who shall devote it to charitable purposes.

The bishop is not entirely free to remit the fine, because the text says debet, whereas the other punishments may or may not be inflicted, ad libitum.

(3) If the cleric does not return to his residence, but submits the reasons for his absence, the Ordinary must call in two examiners, hear their advice, and investigate whether the reasons are acceptable and lawful. Lawful would be sickness, or necessary business transactions connected with the parish or benefice, or other reasons which Christian charity or necessity dictate.[12] Should the Ordinary, after having heard the examiners, think the proffered reasons unacceptable or unlawful, he must assign another term for the cleric's return to his residence. The fine for unlawful absence runs in the meanwhile.

At this stage, i.e., after the second warning, with a new term appointed for the absentee clergyman, another distinction is introduced and must be duly considered, viz., the difference between a removable and an irremovable pastor.

[12] See can. 338 and Vol. II, p. 361 of this Commentary. But private business of merely personal interest cannot be called lawful; these personal interests are not in keeping with clerical obligations.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

a) A removable pastor, who does not return after the second canonical warning, may (not must) be deprived of his parish immediately after the appointed time has elapsed. If he returns within the time set, the Ordinary shall issue a precept to the effect that if he again leaves the parish without a written permission, he shall ipso facto be deprived of the parish. It is not only advisable, but necessary, that a copy or abstract of this precept be kept in the archives of the diocese for further use. We may also add that a written permission is needed for protracted absence. But it does not mean that a removable pastor can not leave his parish for one or two days a week, provided this absence does not occur too frequently.

(b) If a cleric who holds an irremovable benefice (our irremovable pastors are here included) does not return to his residence after being duly warned, but brings forward new excuses for his absence, the Ordinary shall discuss them with the examiners to see whether they may be admitted as lawful. If not, he shall not demand other proofs, but simply command the cleric to return within the time already appointed or a new term now fixed, under penalty of privation of his benefice, to be incurred ipso facto.

If the cleric does not return within the prescribed time, the Ordinary shall declare him deprived of his benefice; if he returns, the Ordinary shall give him a precept like that issued in the case of removable pastors, viz., not to leave the place a second time without a written permission, under penalty of ipso facto incurring privation of benefice.

However, in neither case (whether the cleric be removable or irremovable), should the Ordinary declare the benefice vacant unless he has first discussed the reasons alleged with the two examiners and ascertained for himself that the cleric was unable to obtain a written permission or leave of absence. For it may be that the pastor or beneficiary was retained unlawfully in a place and had no means of communicating with the bishop, or that communications were interrupted for a long time. Besides, it sometimes happens that the secretary or chancellor makes a mistake in opening or reading the mail. The same may happen to the bishop. Hence it is advisable that clergymen ask for leave of absence by registered letter.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE XXXI

DE MODO PROCEDENDI CONTRA CLERICOS CONCUBINARIOS

CAN. 2176

Ordinarius clericum qui contra praescriptum can. 133 mulierem suspectam secum habeat aut quoquo modo frequentet, moneat, ut eam dimittat vel ab eadem frequentanda sese abstineat, comminatis poenis in clericos concubinarios can. 2359 statutis.

CAN. 2177

Si clericus neque praecepto pareat, neque respondeat, Ordinarius, postquam sibi constiterit id clericum praestare potuisse:

1.° Eum suspendat a divinis;

2.° Parochum praeterea statim paroecia privet;

3.° Clericum vero qui aliud beneficium sine animarum cura habet, si, exacto bimestri tempore a suspensione, sese non emendaverit, privet dimidia parte fructuum beneficii; post alios tres menses, omnibus beneficii fructibus; post alios tres menses, ipsomet beneficio.

CAN. 2178

Si clericus non obediat, sed causas excusationis adducat, Ordinarius debet super eisdem audire duos examinatores.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 2179

Si, auditis examinatoribus, Ordinarius existimaverit allatas causas non esse legitimas, id clerico quamprimum significet eique det formale praeceptum ut intra breve tempus a se definiendum pareat.

CAN. 2180

Parochum amovibilem inobedientem Ordinarius statim ad normam can. 2177 coercere potest; si vero agatur de clerico qui, beneficium inamovibile obtinens, non paret, sed novas allegat deductiones, Ordinarius eas ad examen revocet ad normam can. 2178.

CAN. 2181

Si ne eae quidem iudicentur legitimae, Ordinarius clerico rursus praecipiat ut intra congruum tempus mandato obtemperet; quo tempore inutiliter transacto, procedat ad normam can. 2177.

Can. 133 determined the right of the Ordinary concerning the conduct of clergymen towards suspected women. If the bishop's injunction goes unheeded, the cleric may be presumed to be a concubinarian. Can. 2176 states that the Ordinary may issue a canonical warning to such a cleric, asking him to dismiss the suspected woman from his house, or to abstain from visiting her. The warning should contain the threat of penalties as established by can. 2359.

Concubinatus is generally defined as "illicitus consuetudinarius concubitus cum aliqua foemina corrupta et soluta, in domo sua vel alibi commorante."[1] There is no doubt that the term implies a number of transgressions, at least two.[2] Besides, the woman must, according to general opinion, be the same, because concubinage imitates the marital state.[3] Quo modo frequented seems to imply any kind of suspicious conversation or intimacy or visits to a suspected house, for instance, a theatre of ill fame, etc., wherever this may be. Epistolary converse cannot be styled frequentatio; there must be personal visits. The woman must be suspected, viz., suspecta de incontinentia vel lascivia.[4] Suspicion is a kind of doubt which does not permit reason to form a judgment, but inclines it to admit one statement rather than another. Hence, in this case a suspected woman would be one to whom a mala fama had been attached. That there should be a careful investigation of such rumors and the persons who start them goes without saying.[5]

1 Schmalzgrueber defines clericus concubinarius as one "qui concubinam vel domi suae vel extra illam instar uxoris continuo retinet et as-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Two things must be absolutely certain, viz., that the woman is really suspect, and that the clergyman retains or visits her against the command of the bishop. If the concubinatus is not notorious, strong proofs are required, i.e., such as are furnished by two first-class witnesses or by authentic documents.

The text requires a canonical warning, which is to be siduam cum ea tenet consuetudinem;" l. III, tit. 2, n. 9; see also Reiffenstuel, III, 2, n. 13; Wernz, Ius Decret., II, n. 208.

2 Reiffenstuel, l. c., n. 13; Schmalzgrueber, l. c., n. 11; simplex fornicatio cannot be called concubinatus.

3 The S. C. C., quoted by Garzia, De Benef., P. II, c. 10, n. 185, however, held (sess. 24, c. 14, de ref.): "quod habeat locum [sc. hoc decretum] etiamsi clericus modo cum una, modo cum alia deprehendatur."

4 Reiffenstuel, l. c., n. 15, see also A. S. S., VII, 414 f.

5 Ibid., II, tit. 20, n. 363, relates the following: A pastor was accused of such a misdeed, but denied it, although eighty witnesses were produced. He was condemned, but upon a second hearing had to be absolved, because he could prove that all the witnesses testified from hearsay, and the story had been started by one garrulous old woman. Caution, therefore, is required.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google administered according to can. 2143 and is called personal and special, i.e., directed to the clergyman himself, with special mention of the imputation.[6] Besides, the admonition must also contain the threat of the penalties, ferendae sententiae, which are mentioned in can. 2359. This canon refers to clerics in higher or sacred orders only.

The Code now goes on to lay down the rules of procedure after the canonical warning has been issued. Here, again, as under Title XXX, three hypotheses are possible.

The cleric neither obeys the command or precept given by the Ordinary to dismiss the suspected woman, or to abstain from visiting her, nor does he answer at all. In that case the Ordinary must make certain that the clergyman was in a condition to answer the charge. If the admonition was given orally in the presence of two witnesses, there will be no trouble concerning this requisite. If it was sent by registered letter and the receipt kept, it will be a relatively easy matter to find out whether the letter reached its address. There remains only the case where an impediment or obstacle prevents the clergyman from answering, but such cases are rare. Besides, excepting absence, there may be another person asked to answer in general, viz., that the clergyman addressed is at present indisposed and will answer later. Of course, if the letter should have been intercepted by a third person, the clergyman may not know of it.

Provided the warning or precept was duly made and no answer returned, the Ordinary shall proceed as follows:

(a) He shall suspend the cleric a divinis, i.e., from ex-

6 Schmalzgrueber, l. c., III, 2, n. 9; Barbosa, Summa Decisionum Apost., 1658, p. 148, s. v. "Concubinatus."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ercising the acts of the power of ordination (can. 2279, § 2, n. 2°).

(b) If he is a pastor, he shall be immediately deprived of his parish;

(c) Against a beneficiary without the care of souls the Ordinary shall proceed with the privation of half the income if he does not amend within six months from the date of the suspension; after three more months of all the income, and after three more months of the benefice itself, again provided, of course, that no emendation has followed.

There is but one difficulty in this rather categorical procedure,[7] viz., concerning suspension. Is it a censure or a merely provisional penalty? The commentators were divided as to the character of this suspension, some holding that it was a censure, others (the more weighty ones) denying it.[8] The question is rather important, because if there is a censure involved, its violation would render the clergyman irregular. If a pastor, therefore, would say Mass while thus suspended, he would incur irregularity. Is this the intention of the lawgiver? Great canonists, like Reiffenstuel and Schmalzgrueber, maintain that it is not a suspension proper, because not expressed in law, and therefore no censure involving irregularity. However, pace tantorum auctorum, it appears to us that, even if it were not a censure, irregularity would nevertheless be incurred in case of violation. The reason for this assertion lies in can. 985, 7°, where irregularity from crime is attached to any violation of either a personal, medicinal, or vindicative penalty. And that the suspension here mentioned has 7 C. 15, Dist. 81, also threatened a so-called suspension for the faithful who would assist at ecclesiastical functions of clerici concubinarii; which suspension is now out of date.

8 Schmalzgrueber, III, 2, n. 14 f.; Reiffenstuel, III, 2, n. 40 f., deny it.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the character of at least a personal penalty, can hardly be denied. The only way of avoiding this consequence would be found in can. 1933, § 4, where it is said that suspension may be inflicted by way of a precept in an extrajudicial manner. However, according to can. 2306, even a precept belongs to the class of penal remedies, wherefore the penal character of such a suspension must, in our view, be maintained. On the other hand, it is argued that penalties must be interpreted benignly, and since irregularities ex delicto savor, at least indirectly, of penalties, it appears more conformable to the benign spirit of the Church to exclude irregularity. However, this argumentation is specious rather than solid. Therefore, until an authentic interpretation settles the controversy we are bound to cling to the severer opinion.

Whether the Ordinary is obliged to proceed in this manner is solved by can. 2223, which states that, when the law employs preceptive terms, the penalty should, as a rule, be inflicted, but admits delay or postponement to a more opportune time, also mitigation or change of penalty, or even abstaining from infliction, if emendation is achieved and scandal repaired.

2. It is possible that the cleric does not obey the injunction of the Ordinary, but proffers excuses. In that case the Ordinary must call in two examiners and discuss with them the validity or lawfulness of the reasons alleged. This discussion is absolutely required, although the Ordinary is not bound to accept the views of the examiners. But, as stated above, the reasons must be impartially discussed, as also the testimonies on the strength of which the cleric was charged with this offence.

3. The third hypothesis is that the Ordinary, after discussing the proffered reasons with the examiners, finds them unfounded or unlawful, either because they are insufficient or because the evidence is too weak. The result of this negative finding must as soon as possible be communicated to the suspected cleric, together with a formal precept to obey the injunction given in the former warning within a term appointed by the Ordinary. The length of time is not precisely determined except by the adjective brief (breve), which may be interpreted as meaning ten days, more or less, according to circumstances or persons and the danger of scandal.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This last hypothesis has different judicical consequences, according to the difference between removable and irremovable rectors. For can. 2180 rules that a removable cleric who has disobeyed the second warning or formal injunction to dismiss the suspected women or to quit her company, may be punished as contumax (can. 2177) i.e., the Ordinary may (though he is not obliged to) suspend him, and if he is a removable pastor, deprive him of his parish, or if a beneficiary, of the pro rata revenues, and, finally, of the benefice itself.

But an irremovable pastor or beneficiary must be treated somewhat more considerately. He may, after the formal precept, have discovered more and stronger excuses for not obeying the first canonical warning. These new reasons or allegations must again be discussed by the Ordinary with the two examiners. No ballot is required, since the examiners need only be heard.

If these new reasons are rejected by the Ordinary, the latter must issue another precept (which might be called the third canonical warning) bidding the accused cleric to abide by the injunction of the Ordinary, or rather to carry it into effect within the time appointed for that purpose. If the irremovable clergyman does not dismiss the obnoxious woman, or give up her company, the Ordinary shall proceed as stated in can. 2177, i.e., he shall inflict suspension, and deprive the culprit of his parish, of the income, and of the benefice.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Note that can. 2180 permits the Ordinary to proceed, after the third warning, against a removable cleric in the same way as against an irremovable one. Recourse indeed is admitted, but it has no suspensive, but only a devolutive, effect.[9] [9] Bened. XIV, "Ad militantis," March 30, 1742, §§ 12, 25; Archiv für K.-R., 1910, Vol. 90, 697 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XXXII

PROCEDURE AGAINST PASTORS NEGLECTING THEIR PASTORAL DUTIES

CAN. 2182

Parochum qui officia paroecialia de quibus in can. 467, § 1, 468, § 1, 1178, 1330–1332, 1344, graviter neglexerit aut violaverit, Episcopus moneat, in memoriam eius revocans et strictam obligationem qua eius conscientia oneratur et poenas in haec delicta iure statutas.

CAN. 2183

Si parochus sese non emendaverit, Episcopus eum corripiat et aliqua congrua poena pro gravitate culpae puniat, postquam, auditis duobus examinatoribus et facta parocho sese defendendi facultate, probatum iudicaverit praedicta paroecialia officia etiam atque etiam per notabile tempus in re gravis momenti pratermissa aut violata fuisse et eorundem omissiones aut violationes nulla iusta causa excusari.

CAN. 2184

Si et correptio et punitio in irritum cesserint, Ordinarius, probata, ad normam can. 2183, perseverante ac culpabili officiorum paroecialium omissione vel violatione in re gravi, parochum amovibilem sua paroecia statim privare potest; parochum vero inamovibilem

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

beneficii fructibus, pauperibus ab Ordinario distribuendis, pro gravitate culpae in totum vel ex parte privet.

CAN. 2185

Mala voluntate persistente ac probata, ut supra, Ordinarius etiam parochum inamovibilem e sua paroecia removeat.

The neglect here mentioned concerns:

1. The administration of the Sacraments, pastoral correction and charity, care of the sick and dying (can. 467, §1; 468, § 1);

2. Catechetical instruction and personal preaching, especially on Sundays and holydays of obligation (can. 1330–1334; 1344);

3. Neatness and decorum in the house of the Lord, which includes care that no profanation occur (can. 1178).

If a pastor, who is personally responsible for all the things mentioned, grossly neglects or violates the regulations laid down by the law, the bishop shall warn him, recall to his memory the strict and grievous obligation imposed on his conscience, and remind him of the penalties with which the law visits such offences.

Although at first blush this admonition seems to be a merely paternal one, yet can. 2143, § 3 makes it certain that it is intended as an official warning. It must be given either in writing, by registered letter, or orally, in the presence of two witnesses. Note that the bishop is mentioned here, which means that the bishop himself, and not the vicar-general or officialis, should administer this warning.

Gravis neglectus must be judged in proportion to the detriment or spiritual damage that results to souls, but the judgment whether or not it is serious enough to call for a warning is left to the bishop. Besides, according to can. 447, the rural deans are called upon to watch in their respective territories over the fulfillment of these duties.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The penalties mentioned in law are those set forth here, because can. 2382 expressly refers to this title.

If the pastor, after the warning has been duly administered, does not amend his ways, the bishop shall rebuke him and mete out a punishment commensurate with the gravity of his neglect. Corripere and punire says the text. Correptio is a public admonition, to be administered before the ecclesiastical notary or two witnesses, or by letter, but always in such a way that the pastor is really reached.[10] It is a personal reprimand which no doubt has a canonical bearing. Punire, to punish, is a general term embracing all kinds of ecclesiastical punishments, not excluding suspension, as is evident from can. 1933, § 4. Only there should always be a due proportion between guilt and punishment.

However, rebuke and punishment may be inflicted only after the bishop has heard the advice of two examiners and after the pastor has been given a chance to defend himself. This defence may be made personally or by proxy, orally or in writing. If the pastor does not succeed in purging himself of the charge, rebuke and punishment may follow, and are deserved. The defence shall, of course, turn about the fact and about the reasons or excuses that the accused may offer for his neglect. The fact concerns the neglect of pastoral duties, especially if this lasted for a considerable time and affected matters of importance, such as omitting the teaching of catechism for months, or not preaching on many Sundays, or not saying Mass on one or more holydays of obligation, neglecting to hear confessions on the days required, keeping the sacred vessels in an unclean condition, etc. Torn vestments and dirty or disorderly sacristies also belong here. Such neglect may easily be found out at the time of the visitation or through the rural deans.

10 Can. 2309, § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

But the pastor may plead not guilty, in other words, he may offer an excuse. There may indeed be an excuse for not preaching or teaching catechism, for instance, inborn timidity or physical impediments. But there can hardly be an excuse for tolerating filth or disorder. If the pastor is too lazy, he can at least get the altar society to attend to these matters. A prudent Ordinary will weigh personal and local circumstances with justice and impartiality, and if he deems rebuke and punishment necessary, will not fail to administer it cautiously, so that the delinquent's reputation is not jeopardized and the admonition produces its effect.

If neither rebuke nor punishment proves effective, the Ordinary shall again call in the examiners and discuss the facts and excuses with them. If the same culpable neglect continues, and concerns a serious matter, he may remove a removable pastor from his parish without further ado. An irremovable pastor he shall deprive of either a part, or the whole of his income, according to the gravity of the neglect, and distribute the money among the poor. If the misconduct should continue, the Ordinary may remove also an irremovable pastor from his parish. We suppose, however, that can. 2154–2156 should here be taken into consideration, as these dispositions were applied to this case by the "Maxima cura," although the Code is silent about their application. Equity, however, appears to require it.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XXXIII

PROCEDURE IN INFLICTING THE SUSPENSION EX INFORMATA CONSCIENTIA

Up to the time of the Council of Trent the general rule was that no one could be sentenced except he was first tried according to the forms of a properly conducted trial.[1] An apparent exception was admitted in crimes of homicide and heresy, for which, even though occult, a cleric could be judged and suspended. However, even these crimes called for at least the semblance of a trial, because justice requires that every one accused of a crime be given a chance to defend himself and demanding an investigation. Besides the adage: "De internis non iudicat praetor" is applicable to all occult crimes which escape evidence and the courts. However, some kind of a conscientious suspension was, according to a decretal of Lucius III, permitted to regular prelates, who could prohibit their subjects from ascending to higher orders if they had committed a secret delictum known to the superior.[2] This was a partial suspension and strictly reserved to prelates regular.

The Council of Trent ushered in a new era by establishing the suspension called ex informata conscientia.[3] It permitted bishops to inflict suspension on their subjects

1 Cfr. cc. 4, 7, X, I, 11; Bouix, De Iudiciis Eccl., II, 315 ff.; Wernz, Ius Decretalium, Vol. V, P. II, n. 887 ff.; Smith, Elements of Eccl. Law, 1892, Vol. II, 315 ff.

2 C. 5, X, I, 11; Bouix, l. c., II, 317.

3 Sess. 14, c. 1, de ref.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

for an occult crime in an extrajudicial manner. This was extended also to regular confessors found guilty of a crime in connection with confession.[4] That the Jansenists and Regalists were incensed at this extension of the episcopal power is not surprising;[5] but the various ways of interpreting the resp. decree of the Council and the manner in which this power was extolled by a few writers is a surprise indeed.[6] The Code lays down rules which are apt to disperse many misconceptions and misgivings, and also warns the Ordinaries against a too liberal use of this dangerous power. The text first establishes the right to use this power, then sets forth the rules for proceeding, declares for what crimes the suspension ex informata may be inflicted, and, finally, admits recourse to Rome.

THE POWER OF ORDINARIES

CAN. 2186

§ 1. Ordinariis licet ex informata conscientia clericos suos subditos suspendere ab officio sive ex parte sive etiam in totum.

§ 2. Extraordinarium hoc remedium adhibere non licet, si Ordinarius potest sine gravi incommodo ad iuris normam in subditum procedere.

Ordinaries are allowed ex informata conscientia to suspend their clerical subjects from office, either partly or totally. This simple text raises various questions, which call for an answer.

1. What is meant by the phrase, "ex informata con-

4 Clem. X, "Superna," June 21, 1670.

5 Pius VI, "Auctorem fidei," Aug. 28, 1794, prop. 49 f. (Denzinger, l. c., n. 1420 f.).

6 Cfr. Bouix, l. c., II, 359 ff.; Wernz, l. c., n. 891.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

scientia"? [7] No doubt stress is to be laid on conscience, not on informata, because information is required to form the conscience. Negatively, as is evident from the Tridentine text, the meaning is that the bishop, in inflicting this sentence of suspension, need not observe the proceedings of a full and solemn, or even of a summary trial, but may suspend one as soon as his conscience is informed of the crime. However, it must be added that this information is not merely a matter of personal conviction or moral certitude, but must be based upon objective and reliable information. Bouix [8] justly observes that the bishop must have in hand such proofs as would move a judge to give sentence. Therefore, even if a clergyman would confess his guilt privately to the bishop — not in confession, because sacramental knowledge could not be used at all — or if the bishop himself, alone, without other witnesses, would have seen the clergyman commit the crime, he could not make use of this power, because his information would be merely private. The proof must be such as would convince the public. This is evident not only from can. 2190, but also from the fact that recourse (can. 2194) may be had from this sentence, and the S. Congregation (Concilii) would not ratify a sentence not based on objective evidence.

2. The object of this sentence ex informata conscientia is suspension from office. This suspension is described in can. 2279. If the suspension is ab officio, without further determination or limitation, it forbids every act of order, jurisdiction, and administration implied in the office itself, except the administration of the benefice as such. Hence a pastor in our country, when suspended

7 The term does not occur in the conciliar text, but was coined by canonists.

8 L. c., II, 346 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google from office ex informata conscientia, cannot licitly exercise any priestly functions nor validly perform any acts of jurisdiction, nor administer ecclesiastical property, because this administration is attached to his pastoral office, the parish income not being a distinct entity, as if it were a benefice. Can. 2281 says that a suspension ab officio includes all offices which a clergyman may hold in a diocese.

On the other hand, this suspension does not include the benefice,[9] wherefore the administration and enjoyment of the benefice is not taken away from the beneficiary. Much less does our text permit sentence of excommunication or interdict to be pronounced ex informata conscientia.[10] Does it include ascent to, or reception of, the higher orders? According to the decree of the Council of Trent and all commentators up to the promulgation of the Code, this suspension could be inflicted upon a cleric who wished to receive higher orders. However, the Code only mentions suspension ab officio, i.e., an office which one is supposed to hold. Consequently, since penalties must be strictly interpreted, suspension from receiving a higher order can no longer be inflicted ex informata conscientia. Neither is such a measure required, inasmuch as the irregularities and impediments cover the field sufficiently.[11]

The suspension may be either partial or total. It is total, if all the effects of suspension are intended, i.e., all acts of the power of order and jurisdiction as well

9 Some authors, v. g., Santi (V, 1, n. 22) held this, but it was justly rejected by others, v. g., Wernz, l. c., n. 897.

10 Bouix, II, 341.

11 This seems more probable also on the ground that the new law requires for every office of any importance the priestly character. Therefore only the prelacies might be considered or, more correctly speaking, the episcopate. But the processus informativus and S. C. Consist. will settle this point quite effectively.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

as of administration. It is partial, if only the one or the other effect is clearly indicated — because these must according to can. 2188, 3°, be pointed out expressly — as, for instance, from hearing confessions, a divinis, etc., as enumerated in can. 2279.

3. The prelates who may inflict this suspension are here simply called Ordinaries, i.e., all those who go by the name of Ordinary, according to can. 198: residential bishops, abbots and prelates nullius, vicars and prefects apostolic, administrators, and religious superiors of exempt clerical orders. The vicar-general is excluded, unless he has obtained a special commission from his bishop, because can. 2220, § 2, certainly must here be applied, as was held before.[12] As to the superiors of exempt clerical institutes, it is certain that they may suspend their subjects from office. This power is vested in all provincials and such as hold their places, hence also in conventual priors or guardians. According to can. 199, § 1, this power may, either partially or totally, be delegated to others. Thus an absent abbot may delegate this power to a cloistral prior, a guardian to the vicar, etc. But can. 519 must always be observed. Hence, though a religious may have been suspended by his superior ex informata conscientia from hearing confessions, he could absolve validly if he had obtained jurisdiction from the local Ordinary.[13]

4. Who is the passive subject of this power? The text says: "clericos suos subditos," i. e., all their clerical subjects. Therefore, laymen do not fall under this penalty.[14] On the other hand, any one who has received 12 Thus Wernz, l. c., V, P. II, n. 892, and others, quoted by him ibidem.

13 S. C. EE. et RR., July 2, 1627; March 2, 1866 (Bizzarri, Collect., p. 24, p. 755).

14 Formerly they could, because of the prohibition of receiving orders.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the tonsure, is a cleric, and may therefore be suspended ex informata. Besides, the Ordinary can inflict this sentence on all who hold an office in his diocese, whether with or without a dignity. Therefore the vicar-general, canons, consultors, and officials are subject to such a sentence.[15] Concerning offices which one holds in a strange diocese, can. 2282 must be observed. This sentence follows the clergyman affected by it everywhere.[16] Ordinaries may also suspend regulars from hearing confessions, even though they had obtained faculties from the local Ordinary without limitation; nor is the latter bound to indicate the reasons for this suspension.[17]

In order, however, to remind Ordinaries of the extraordinary character of this power, they are warned to make use thereof for no frivolous reasons; in other words, they should not inflict suspension ex informata conscientia when they can proceed in the judiciary way without great inconvenience (can. 2186, § 2). For the procedure ex informata conscientia involves a severity which is justified only by very strong reasons, such as the public welfare, scandal to be avoided, or very serious guilt.[18] Thereby, however, we do not mean to say that the sentence would be invalid if the reasons were not entirely strong enough, because the text merely says: "adhibere non licet."[19]

15 Wernz, l. c., n. 893.

16 See can. 2226, § 4.

17 Clem. X, "Superna," June 21, 1670, § 6.

18 Bouix, l. c., II, 344; a case of this kind was solved by S. C. C., Feb. 25, 1875 (A. S. S., VII, 547 ff.).

19 Bened. XIV, De Syn. Dioesc., XII, 8, 6, says that a bishop who would declare at a synod that henceforth he would proceed only ex informata conscientia would deserve to be rebuked, because his action would savor of ambition and ostentation and breed hateful tyranny, or autocracy, as we would now style it.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PROCEDURE IN INFLICTING THIS PENALTY

CAN. 2187

Ad ferendam hanc suspensionem neque formae iudiciales neque canonicae monitiones requiruntur; sed satis est si Ordinarius, servato praescripto canonum qui sequuntur, simplici decreto declaret se suspensionem indicere.

CAN. 2188

Huiusmodi decretum detur in scriptis, nisi adiuncta aliud exigant, designato die, mense et anno; in eoque:

1.° Expresse dicatur suspensionem ferri ex informata conscientia seu ex causis ipsi Ordinario notis;

2.° Indicetur tempus durationis poenae; abstineat autem Ordinarius ab ipsa infligenda in perpetuum. Potest vero infligi etiam tanquam censura, dummodo hoc in casu clerico patefiat causa propter quam suspensio irrogatur;

3.° Clare indicentur actus qui prohibentur, si suspensio non in totum sed ex parte infligatur.

CAN. 2189

§ 1. Si clericus suspensus sit ab officio in quo alius in eius locum substituendus est, ut, ex. gr., oeconomus in cura animarum, qui substituitur mercedem ex fructibus beneficii percipiat secundum prudens Ordinarii iudicium determinandam.

§ 2. Clericus suspensus, si se gravatum senserit, potest imminutionem pensionis petere ab immediato Superiore qui in via iudiciaria esset iudex appellationis.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 2190

Ordinarius, qui fert suspensionem ex informata conscientia, debet ex peractis investigationibus tales collegisse probationes, quae eum certum reddant clericum delictum revera perpetrasse et quidem adeo grave ut eiusmodi poena coercendus sit.

It was stated above that informata conscientia means absence or lack of judicial procedure, either summary or solemn. This is clearly indicated in can. 2187, which states that neither judiciary formalities (such as summons, contestatio litis, hearing of witnesses, defence, sentence), nor canonical warnings are required to inflict a suspension ex informata conscientia; all that is required is that the Ordinary observes the rules here laid down and simply declares that the suspension is hereby inflicted.[20]

Can. 2188 rules that the decree of suspension must be issued in writing, unless the circumstances should advise another mode, for instance, when there is a well-founded suspicion that the clergyman or others are bent on causing trouble in any shape or form. The decree must contain the precise date, i.e., day, month, and year of issue. Besides, it must contain the following statements:

1.° That the suspension is inflicted ex informata conscientia, or for reasons known to the Ordinary;

2.° That it is inflicted for a certain clearly expressed period of time;

20 The following formula may be used (see Smith, l. c., II, p. 331, according to Monacelli): "Constito nobis; presbyterum N. esse reum criminis, eum ob causas quae animum nostrum digne movent, et de quibus Deo et Sedi Apostolicae, cum habuerimus in mandatis, rationem reddere debemus, et ex informata conscientia, a divinis [ab audiendis confessionibus a dicenda Missa] suspendimus per sex [tres] menses, et suspensum declaramus, ac ei decretum suspensionis intimari mandamus. N. Episcopus N., N. Actuarius."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3.° A specification of the acts forbidden if the suspension is partial only.

The reason for 1° is that the clergyman may know immediately that no appeal to a higher instance or court is admitted. On recourse to Rome, see can. 2194.

To n. 2 the text itself adds that the Ordinary should abstain from inflicting a perpetual suspension. However, this does not mean that a suspension inflicted in perpetuum would be null and void; because the text itself has no invalidating, but only a warning clause. Therefore, to assert the invalidity of such an indefinite or perpetual suspension would be against the wording of the text.[21] If the Ordinary should suspend one "ad beneplacitum nostrum," this would be an indefinite suspension, but would expire with the death or removal of the Ordinary who issued the sentence.[22]

The text adds to n. 2 that the suspension ex informata conscientia may also be issued as a censure, provided the reason for which it is inflicted is made known to the cleric in the case. Although the effect would be the same, yet absolution in case of repentance and repair of scandal could not be withheld (can. 2242, § 3).

It was said that the effect is the same, no matter whether the suspension is inflicted as a vindictive penalty or as a censure. This effect consists in prohibiting the clergyman from exercising the functions attached to his office, either partially or totally. If notwithstanding this suspension the clergyman would perform the forbidden acts, he would become irregular.[23]

21 Smith, l. c., II, p. 323, maintained invalidity, for which he could refer to S. C. C., Feb. 24, 1853 (A. S. S., VII, 574 f.; he might have added S. C. C., Dec. 20, 1873, A. S. S., ib.); but Bouix, l. c., II, 334 f., defended the validity and could also allege decisions of the S. C. C. Wernz, l. c., n. 898 simply says: "non potest infligi —"; answer: "licite, concedo; valide, nego."

22 Bouix, l. c., II, 336; Wernz, l. c., n. 900.

23 Cfr. can. 985, n. 7; S. C. C.,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

If one is suspended from office in such a way that another must take his place, as, for instance, when a pastor is suspended from his pastoral office, the substitute must be paid from the income of the benefice or the pastor's salary, respectively. The amount of the remuneration to be paid to the substitute is to be determined by the Ordinary according to his own prudent judgment. In our country, where no state funds can be resorted to, this will depend on the wealth or income of the parish. This may cause some trouble. For the suspended clergyman may think himself unjustly treated if too much is subtracted from his salary. There may not be enough left to support him. Therefore, the Code permits him to appeal (in the widest sense of the word) to his immediate superior. The scope of this quasi-appeal is to ask for a diminution of the amount of compensation decreed by the Ordinary for the substitute. To the metropolitan court, therefore, or the court of appeal in the second instance, a clergyman who thinks himself aggrieved should have recourse. But note well that this is no recourse from the sentence inflicted ex informata conscientia, but merely concerns the material question of support or remuneration.

Can. 2189 rules, what was already explained above, that the Ordinary who suspends a cleric ex informata conscientia, must have evidence sufficient to be certain:

1.° That the cleric really perpetrated the crime with which he is charged, and

2.° That the crime is of a nature to deserve such a severe punishment.[24]

April 8, 1848, ad IV (A. S. S., XIV, 314); Wernz, l. c., n. 901.

24 Some cases may be seen in A. S. S., VII, p. 569 ff. (turpissimi criminis); VIII, 547 ff. (of the same nature); XIV, 299 ff. (prava vivendi ratio et corrupti mores, also embezzlement of church funds).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

OCCULT CRIMES

CAN. 2191

§ 1. Suspensioni ex informata conscientia iustam ac legitimam causam praebet delictum occultum ad normam can. 2197, n. 4.

§ 2. Ob notorium delictum suspensio ex informata conscientia nunquam ferri potest.

§ 3. Ut delictum publicum suspensione ex informata conscientia plecti possit, occurrat necesse est aliquod ex adiunctis quae sequuntur:

1.° Si testes probi et graves delictum quidem Ordinario patefaciant, sed nulla ratione induci possint ut de eo testimonium in iudicio ferant, neque aliis probationibus delictum iudiciali processu evinci possit;

2.° Si ipsemet clericus minis aut aliis adhibitis mediis impediat ne processus iudiciarius instituatur aut inceptus perficiatur;

3.° Si processui iudiciali conficiendo ferendaeque sententiae impedimenta exoriantur ex adversis civilibus legibus aut gravi scandali periculo.

CAN. 2192

Suspensio ex informata conscientia valet si ex pluribus delictis unum tantum fuerit occultum.

The two canons settle the controversy as to which crimes can be punished with suspension ex informata conscientia. The Council of Trent really intended and mentioned only a "crimen occultum," as is manifest from the preface to Sess. 14, de ref. For public and notorious crimes the bishops needed no extension of their power, since they could prosecute these in the judiciary way.[25]

25 Wernz, l. c., n. 896.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The text itself, ch. 1 of session 14, explicitly states: "occult crime." Nevertheless some authors extended this suspension to public crimes.[26] The Code takes the golden mean between the two extremes.

1.° A just and legitimate cause for suspending one ex informata conscientia is an occult crime, i.e., one which is not yet divulged or has been committed under, or is involved in, circumstances which render it unlikely that it will become known. "Occultum, quod non est publicum," says can. 2197.

Hence, if the crime is not liable to be divulged on account of the secret circumstances under which it was committed, it is supposed to remain secret. This is somewhat similar to a secret impediment, which is one that cannot be fully proved in court. However, if a case has been tried in court, although without result, it can no longer be called occult, and in that hypothesis the Ordinary would act wisely if he abstained from inflicting suspension ex informata conscientia.[27]

2.° Suspension ex informata conscientia can never be inflicted for a notorious crime because such a crime requires judiciary procedure, in order to safeguard public welfare and justice and the authority of the law. This was generally admitted.

3.° The Code makes some concessions to those who hold that this suspension may be inflicted also for a public crime, but it requires that at least one of the three following conditions be present:

a) That trustworthy and serious witnesses made the 26 Thus Bouix, l. c., II, 325 f.

27 S. C. C., Dec. 20, 1873 (A. S. S., VII, 569) granted an appeal proper, because the case had been brought before the civil court, which could not find sufficient proof for condemnation, and then twice before the ecclesiastical court, from which the pastor appealed, but was in the meanwhile suspended by the bishop ex inf. consc., in order to cause less noise.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

crime known to the Ordinary, but cannot in any way be induced to make depositions at a trial, and no other evidence is at hand which would prove the crime in a judiciary way;[28]

b) that the clergyman would use threats or other means to impede or stop a judiciary trial;

c) that the civil law or a serious scandal stand in the way of a formal trial or judicial sentence. This is possible in countries where the brachium sæculare not only does not assist but directly opposes the Church.[29]

Suspension ex informata conscientia is valid if only one crime of several imputed to the same party is occult. Thus if a clergyman should be publicly accused and tried for embezzlement of church funds, but has also been guilty of a crime which is not provable in court, he may be suspended ex informata conscientia.[30]

MANIFESTATION OF REASONS AND RECOURSE

CAN. 2193

Prudenti Ordinarii arbitrio relinquitur suspensionis causam seu delictum clerico patefacere aut reticere, pastorali tamen adhibita sollicitudine et caritate, ut, si delictum clerico manifestare censuerit, poena, ex paternis quae interposuerit monitis, nedum ad expiationem culpae, verum etiam ad emendationem delinquentis et ad occasionem peccati eliminandam inserviat.

28 This was the case narrated in A. S. S., VII, 570; puella honesta et sincera, quae turpia passa est a clerico.

29 As to b) and c) see S. C. C., April 8, 1848 (A. S. S., XIV, 300); the witnesses were serious and respectable citizens, but afraid of the pastor, and the civil court seemed to favor the priest.

30 S. C. C., April 8, 1848; Feb. 27, 1875 (A. S. S., XIV, 299 ff.; VIII, 547 ff.).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 2194

Si clericus recursum a suspensione sibi inflicta interponat, Ordinarius ad Sedem Apostolicam mittere debet probationes quibus constet clericum delictum revera perpetrasse quod extraordinaria hac poena puniri queat.

The Tridentine decree permitted Ordinaries to inflict this suspension quomodolibet, etiam extraiudicialiter. Since, then, there is no judiciary procedure involved, it is left to the prudent judgment of the Ordinary to manifest or conceal the reason for the suspension. If he deems it prudent to make the reason known to the suspended cleric, he should use pastoral care and charity, in order that the penalty inflicted and accompanied by paternal admonitions, will not only procure an atonement of the transgression, but also better the delinquent and eliminate further occasions of sin. For the Ordinaries, as our Code,[31] following the Council of Trent, says, should remember that they are "pastores, non percussores." Of course, the admonitions referred to are not canonical, but purely paternal, and hence destitute of the judiciary character.

The lawgiver, however, in order not to leave the suspended clergyman entirely defenceless, which would be against every dictate of justice, allows him to have recourse to the Apostolic See (S. C. Concilii). Hence there is no appeal to the metropolitan or second instance. This recourse has no suspensive, but only a devolutive effect, and the suspended clergyman must therefore conduct himself as one suspended, and abstain from every act prohibited by the suspension, whether specifically or generally stated.

31 Can. 2214, § 2; Trid., Sess. 13, c. 1, de ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The Ordinary must forward the papers to the same S. Congregation. They must contain the evidence or proofs that the clergyman really committed the crime for which he was suspended ex informata conscientia. These must be sent in trustworthy and correct abstracts bearing the official seal and signature. If the witnesses do not object, the original documents may be sent, provided a faithful translation accompanies the vernacular text. Besides, we may reasonably suppose that if the sentence was inflicted for a public crime, at least one of the three conditions mentioned above should be added and testified to; otherwise there might be delay in deciding the case.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

APPENDIX I

(To Canon 1990)

The Papal Commission for the Authentic Interpretation of the Code has decided the following cases:[1]

1. If two Catholic parties have contracted marriage before the civil magistrate only, without observing the "Tametsi" or the "Ne temere," in places where these laws are binding, and wish to contract marriage anew in facie Ecclesiae, or to have their civilly contracted marriage revalidated, the local Ordinary (or the pastor after having consulted the local Ordinary) may declare the first marriage null and void without a formal trial and without the intervention of the defensor vinculi, after having made the investigation prescribed in can. 1019, i.e., after having ascertained the free status of the couple, — that no other impediment except the formerly clandestinely and therefore invalid contracted civil marriage is in the way.

2. The same rule is to be applied in cases of mixed marriage contracted invalidly in a non-Catholic Church under the same condition, provided the Catholic party wishes to contract a new marriage with a Catholic.

3. The same rule applies in cases where apostates from the Catholic faith have contracted an invalid civil marriage for the same reason, and, now repentant, wish to contract a new marriage with a Catholic party in facie Ecclesiae.

But in each and every one of these cases a civil divorce must have first been obtained.

1 Cfr. A. Ap. S., Vol. XI, 479 (Oct. 16, 1919). We add this decision here for the convenience of those who have the first edition of Vol. V of this Commentary.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

APPENDIX II

"DECRETUM" AND "DECERNERE"

Canon 1868 states that "all other settlements are called decrees," and hence it seems worth while to give a list of these contained in the Code. We shall do so by quoting the respective canons and mentioning the topics treated therein.

1. Can. 1570, § 2	Intimation of decrees.
2. Can. 1577, § 2	Official's administration method.
3. Can. 1591, § 1	Beadle.
4. Can. 1601	No recourse from decrees.
5. Can. 1604, § 4	Signatura decrees acceptance of petitions.
6. Can. 1607, § 2	Bishop decrees extraordinary ministers.
7. Can. 1627	Order of taking cognizance.
8. Can. 1635	Dilatory terms.
9. Can. 1638, § 1	Hours of trial.
10. Can. 1639, § 1	Days of trial.
11. Can. 1663	Removal of procurator and advocate.
12. Can. 1672, § 3	Sequestration.
13. Can. 1674	"
14. Can. 1675, §§ 2, 3	"
15. Can. 1699, § 3	Spoliation.
16. Can. 1710	Oblatio libelli.
17. Can. 1724	Summons.
18. Can. 1729, §§ 2, 3, 4	Litis contestatio.
19. Can. 1758	Suspected witnesses.
20. Can. 1765	Summons of witnesses.
21. Can. 1782, § 1	Publication of witnesses.
22. Can. 1784	Rejection of witnesses.
23. Can. 1786	Readmission of witnesses.
24. Can. 1796, § 2	Experts.
25. Can. 1799, § 1	"

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

26. Can. 1806	Local inspection.
27. Can. 1810	" "
28. Can. 1811, § 1	" "
29. Can. 1821, § 1	Documents.
30. Can. 1823, § 3	"
31. Can. 1830, § 5	Oaths.
32. Can. 1839	Incidental questions.
33. Can. 1840, §§ 1, 3	" "
34. Can. 1856, § 2	Attempts.
35. Can. 1857, § 1	"
36. Can. 1860, § 3	Publicatio processus.
37. Can. 1861, § 2	Conclusio in causa.
38. Can. 1868, § 2	Decrees.
39. Can. 1878, §§ 2, 3	Correction of errors.
40. Can. 1880, n. 6.	Appeal.
41. Can. 1899, § 4	Opposition of Third Person.
42. Can. 1907, § 2	Restitutio in integrum.
43. Can. 1918	Execution of sentence.
44. Can. 1946, § 2	Denunciation.
45. Can. 1957	Removal from a place.
46. Can. 1958	" " "
47. Can. 1988	Matrimonial cases.
48. Can. 1992	" "
49. Can. 2040, § 2	Beatification and Canonization Decrees.
50. Can. 2073
51. Can. 2078
52. Can. 2083, § 2
53. Can. 2084
54. Can. 2087, §§ 1, 3
55. Can. 2100, § 3
56. Can. 2110, § 1
57. Can. 2115, §§ 1, 2
58. Can. 2124, § 1, 2
59. Can. 2134
60. Can. 2139
61. Can. 2140
62. Can. 2141
63. Can. 2146	Removal of pastors.
64. Can. 2152, § 2	" " "
65. Can. 2153, §§ 1, 3	" " "
66. Can. 2154, § 1	" " "

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

67. Can. 2155	Removal of Pastors.
68. Can. 2161, §1	" " "
69. Can. 2187	Suspension ex informata conscientia.
70. Can. 2188	" " " "

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

89059251009 b89059251009a

may be k

FO

from last dat will be char

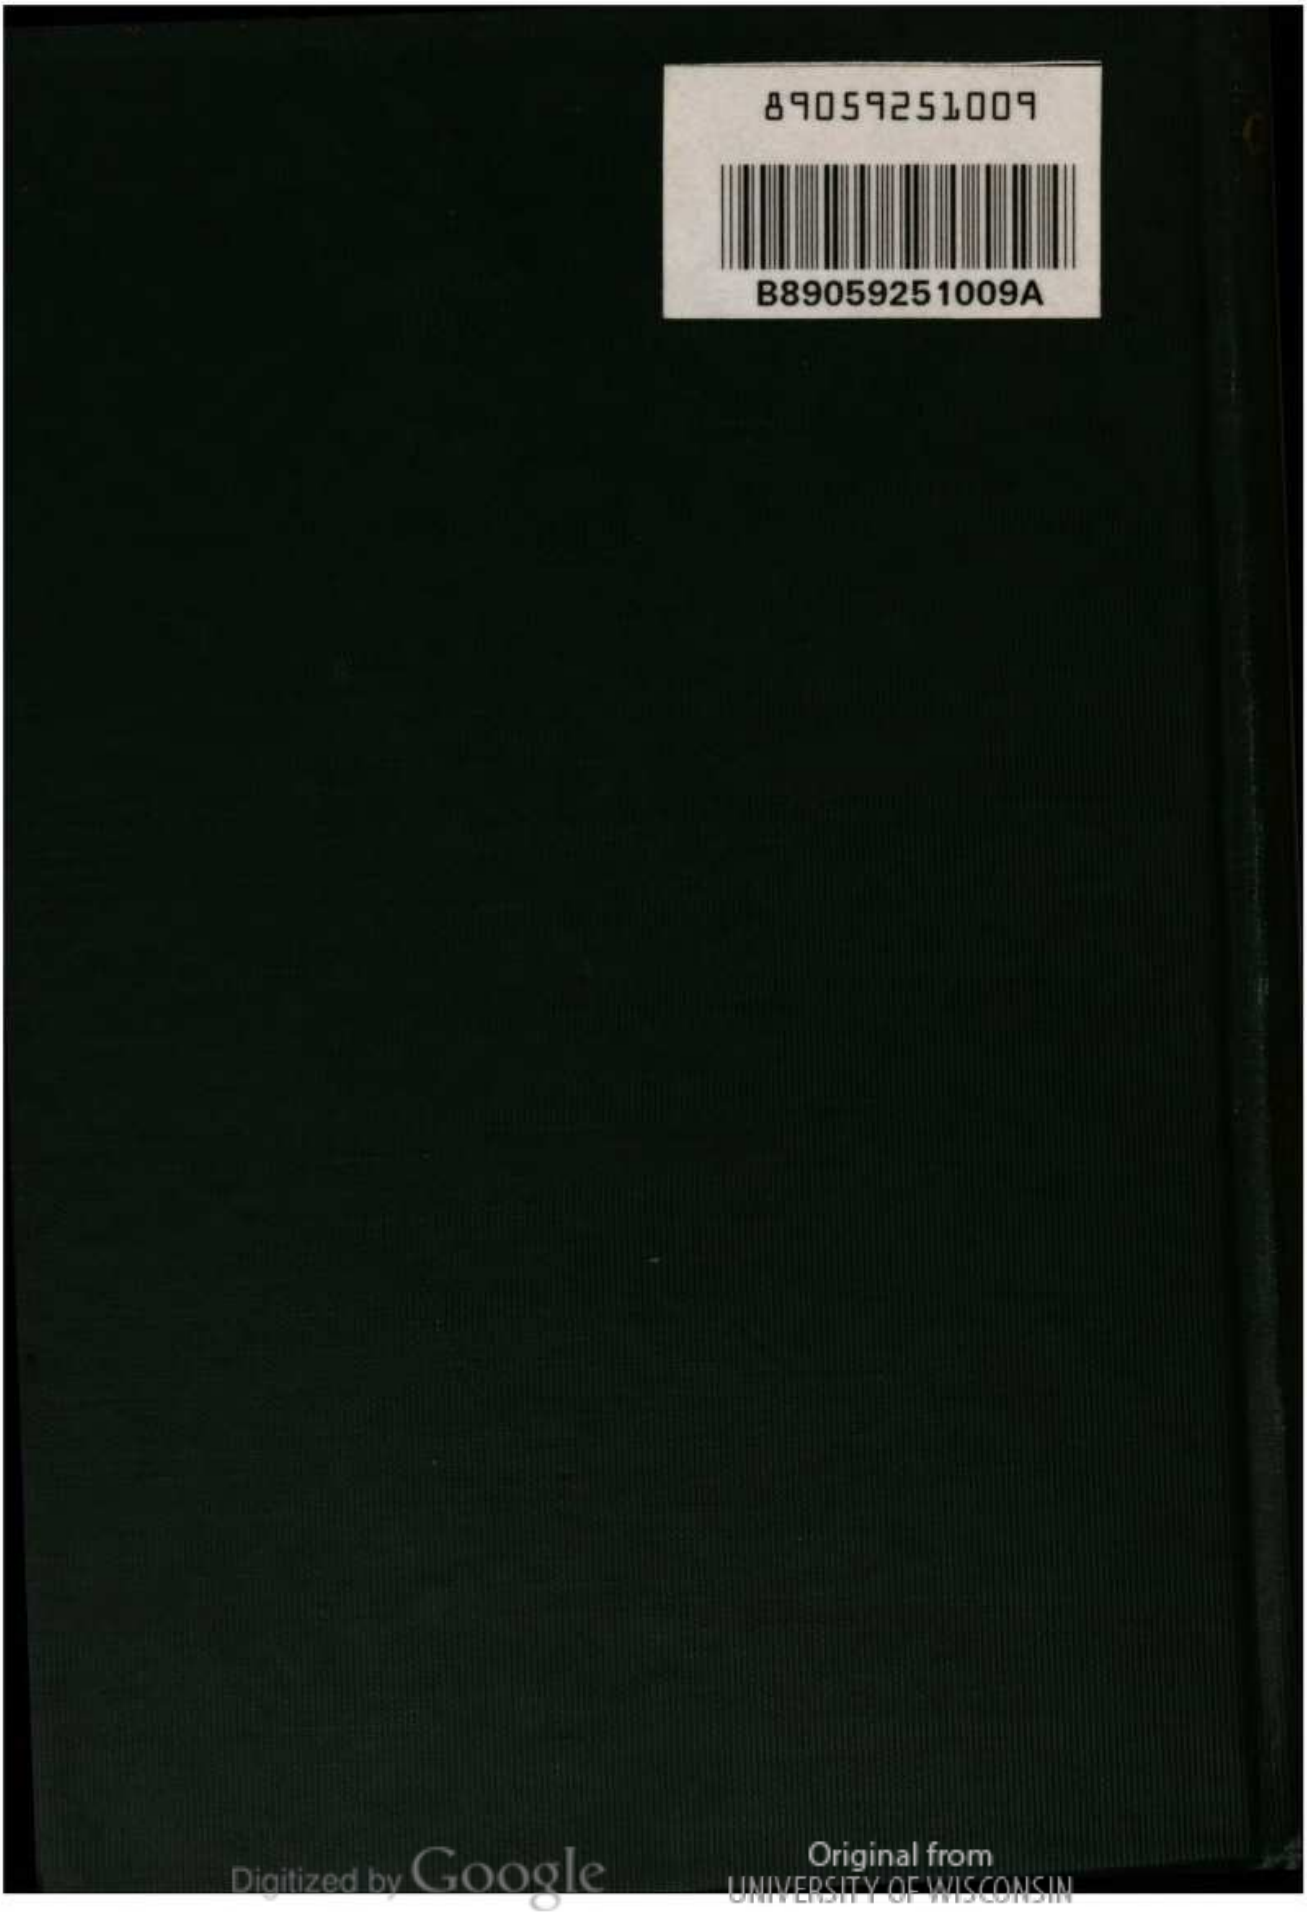
28Se'5

2

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN



Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

89059251009
B89059251009A
Digitized by Google
Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A COMMENTARY on CANON LAW

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Library of the

University of Wisconsin

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

A COMMENTARY ON THE NEW CODE OF CANON LAW

By THE REV. P. CHAS. AUGUSTINE, O.S.B., D.D.
Professor of Canon Law

VOLUME VIII

BOOK V

Penal Code (Can. 2195-2414) with complete index

B. HERDER BOOK CO.
17 SOUTH BROADWAY, ST. LOUIS, MO.
AND
68 GREAT RUSSELL ST., LONDON, W. C.
1922

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CUM PERMISSU SUPERIORUM

NIHIL OBSTAT

Sti. Ludovici, die 25. Aug., 1922.

F. G. Holweck,
Censor Librorum

IMPRIMATUR

Sti. Ludovici, die 25. Aug., 1922.

✠Joannes J. Glennon,
Archiepiscopus
Sti. Ludovici

Copyright, 1922, by
B. Herder Book Co.

All rights reserved

Printed in U. S. A.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CQ
1B12
8

587684

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CONTENTS

	PAGE
BOOK V. INTRODUCTION	1
PART I. ON CRIMES	9
TITLE I. NATURE AND DIVISION OF CRIMES	9
Publicity of Crimes	15
Ecclesiastical, Civil, and Mixed Crimes	18
TITLE II. IMPUTABILITY, AGGRAVATING OR EXTENUATING CIRCUMSTANCES, AND JURIDICAL EFFECTS OF CRIME	22
Imputability in General	22
Defectus Cognitionis	25
Carelessness	34
Age	37
Violence, Fear, Necessity, Detriment	38
The Passions	43
Aggravating Circumstances	45
Parties to a Crime	47
Consequences of Crime	52
TITLE III. Conatus Delicti OR INCHOATE CRIMES	55
PART II. PENALTIES	58
SECTION I. PENALTIES IN GENERAL	58
TITLE IV. DEFINITION, KINDS, INTERPRETATION, AND APPLICATION OF PENALTIES	66
Definition	66
Different Kinds of Penalties	69
Application of Penalties	75
Interpretation of Penalties	78
TITLE V. SUPERIORS WHO WIELD COERCIVE POWER	82
Coercive Powers	83
The Judge	88
TITLE VI. WHO ARE LIABLE TO THE COERCIVE POWER OF THE CHURCH	93
General Rules and Exceptions	93

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

PAGE
The Criminal Act 96
Psychological and Physiological Requisites of Crime and Criminal Co-Operation 97
When Penalties Take Effect 102
Multiplied and Attempted Crimes 104
TITLE VII. REMISSION OF PENALTIES 106
Who May Grant Pardon 106
The Ordinary's Power with Regard to Common Law 108
Conditions and Mode of Pardon 110
SECTION II. PENALTIES IN PARTICULAR 112
TITLE VIII. CORRECTIVE PENALTIES OR CENSURES . . 112
CHAPTER I. CENSURES IN GENERAL 112
Appeal or Recourse from Censures 120
Multiplication of Censures 123
Reservation of Censures 128
Absolution from Censures 139
Necessity and Claim to Absolution—Revival of Censures 140
Absolution from Several Censures 143
Absolution from Sin and Censure 145
Absolution in the External and Internal Forum . 148
Those Empowered to Absolve from Censures . . 151
1. Absolution in Danger of Death 151
2. Absolution When There Is No Danger of Death 154
3. Absolution in More Urgent Cases 157
CHAPTER II. CENSURES IN PARTICULAR 163
Art. 1. Excommunication 168
Nature and Division 170
Inseparable Effects 175
Exclusion from Divine Office 176
Reception and Administration of Sacraments and Sacramentals 179
Exclusion from the Suffragia 183
Exclusion from Legal Acts 187
Loss of Income from Dignity, Office, etc. . . . 192
Social or Civil Intercourse 193

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE

Art. II. The Interdict 194
Definition and Division 195
Authorities Who Can Inflict the Interdict . . . 198
Effects of an Interdict 201
Consequences of Local Interdicts 201
Effects of a Personal Interdict 209
Mitigation for the Personally Innocent . . . 213
The Interdict Forbidding One to Enter a Church 215
Art. III. Suspension or Clerical Censure . . . 216
Nature and Distinction 217
Effects of Suspension 218
Extent of Suspension 226
Mitigation of the Effects 231
Suspension of Communities 232

TITLE IX. VINDICTIVE PENALTIES 235

CHAPTER I. VINDICTIVE PENALTIES COMMON TO ALL THE FAITHFUL 242

CHAPTER II. VINDICTIVE PENALTIES FOR CLERICS . . 252

TITLE X. PENAL REMEDIES AND PENANCES 264

CHAPTER I. PENAL REMEDIES 265

CHAPTER II. PENANCES 271

PART III. PENALTIES FOR INDIVIDUAL CRIMES 274

TITLE XI. CRIMES AGAINST FAITH AND UNITY . . . 275
Apostasy, Heresy, and Schism 275
Suspicion of Heresy 284
Coöperation in Heresy 287
Teaching and Defending Condemned Doctrines . . 289
Penalties in Regard to Forbidden Books 294
Mixed Marriages and Non-Catholic Education . . 296

TITLE XII. CRIMES AGAINST RELIGION 301
Desecration of Consecrated Species 301
Violation of the Laws of Bination and Fasting . . 304
Saying Mass and Hearing Confessions by Persons not Priests 305
Blasphemy and Perjury 308
Trafficking in Mass Stipends and Defraudation . . 311

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE

Superstition and Sacrilege 312
Trading in False Relics 315
Trafficking in Indulgences 316
Desecration of Graves and Corpses 318
Desecration of Churches and Cemeteries . . . 319

TITLE XIII. CRIMES AGAINST ECCLESIASTICAL AUTHORITIES, PERSONS, AND THINGS 321
Transgressions of Laws Concerning Papal Election 321
Disobedience and Conspiracy 323
Appeal to a General Council 327
Civil Interference with Papal Communications (Placet) 330
Violation of the Liberty and Rights of the Church 334
Freemasonry 339
Incitement of Priests to Insubordination . . . 347
Disregard of Reservation and of Penalties . . . 350
Extortion of Christian Burial 357
Perseverance in Censure 361
Violation of the Privilegium Fori 363
Papal Enclosure 368
Violation of the Privilegium Canonis 375
Public Verbal Injuries 380
Usurping and Retaining Property and Rights of the Roman Church 384
Usurpation and Secularization of Church Property 386
Illegal Alienation 392
Neglect to Execute Pious Bequests 395
Refusal to Pay Stole Fees and Taxes 396

TITLE XIV. CRIMES AGAINST LIFE, LIBERTY, PROPERTY, GOOD NAME 397
Duelling 403
Compulsion in Regard to the Clerical or Religious Vocation 406
Abduction of Women 407
Mixed Crimes 408
Private Verbal Injuries 410
Bigamy 411
Crimes of Laymen against Good Morals 413
Clerical Offenders contra Sextum 416

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE

TITLE XV. Crimen Falsi OR FORGERY 419
Forgery of Papal Documents 419
Subreptitious and Obreptitious Rescripts . . . 422
False Accusation of Solicitation 424

TITLE XVI. UNLAWFUL ADMINISTRATION AND RECEPTION OF ORDERS AND OTHER SACRAMENTS . . . 428
Administration of the Sacraments to Persons Forbidden by Law to Receive Them 428
Confirmation Administered by a Priest 430
Hearing Confessions and Giving Absolution from Reserved Sins without Jurisdiction 431
Absolutio Complicis 434
Sollicitatio 437
Violation of the Seal of Confession 441
Episcopal Consecration without an Apostolic Mandate 444
Simoniacal Administration and Reception of Orders and Sacraments 445
Reception of Orders from Censured Ecclesiastics 447
Illegal Ordination 449
Illegal Reception of Orders 451
Unlawful Mixed Marriages 452

TITLE XVII. VIOLATION OF THE OBLIGATIONS PROPER TO THE CLERICAL OR RELIGIOUS STATE 454
Refusal to Take Examinations 454
Stubborn Absence from Pastoral Conferences . . 455
Serious Neglect of Rites and Ceremonies 456
Refusal to Wear the Clerical Dress 458
Trading Forbidden to Clerics 460
Violation of the Law of Residence 462
Neglect of Pastoral Duties 464
Carelessness in Keeping the Parish Books . . . 464
Negligence on the Part of the Canonicus Theologus and Poenitentiarius 466
Apostates a Religione 467
Fugitive Religious 471
Profession Void by Reason of Deceit 473
Marriage Attempted by Clerics and Religious . . 475
Violations of Community Life 480

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PAGE

TITLE XVIII. CRIMES COMMITTED IN CONFERRING, RECEIVING, AND DISMISSING ECCLESIASTICAL DIGNITIES, OFFICES, AND BENEFICES 483
Violation of the Freedom of Elections 483
Election, Nomination or Presentation of Unworthy Candidates; Non-Observance of Essential Formalities 487
Simony in Ecclesiastical Offices, Benefices, and Dignities 491
Neglect of Ratification or Institution 492
Illegally Taking Possession of Ecclesiastical Offices, etc. 494
Acceptance of an Office not Vacant de Iure . . . 496
Retention of Incompatible Offices 497
Refusal of the Cardinal's Oath 498
Neglect of Episcopal Consecration 499
Forsaking One's Post 500
Resignation of an Ecclesiastical Office into the Hands of Laymen 501
Retention of Office Despite Privation or Removal 502
Neglect to Receive the Abbatial Blessing 503
Neglect of Profession of Faith 503

TITLE XIX. ABUSE OF ECCLESIASTICAL POWER OR OFFICE 505
Abuse of Ecclesiastical Power 505
Tampering with Diocesan Documents 506
Perfidious and Neglectful Handling of Official Acts 508
Attempted Bribery of Diocesan Officials . . . 510
Overcharge of Taxes 511
Illegal Issuance of Dimissorial Letters by the Vicar Capitular 512
Religious Superiors Granting Illegal Dimissorials . 513
Illegal Admission to Novitiate or Profession . . 514
Transgressions concerning Dowries and Notification of the Ordinary 515
Religious Superiors Interfering with the Canonical Visitation 517
Superioresses Violating Freedom of Conscience . 521

ALPHABETICAL INDEX 523

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

THE PENAL CODE

BOOK V

INTRODUCTION

"Brutal laws brutalize a people," is a well known dictum of Montesquieu. If this is true of all laws, it is even more so of penal laws. For penalty means pain or suffering, and if this is out of proportion with the crime, it becomes an incentive to rebellion against law, and finally against authority itself. Moderation in the penal code, therefore, should be the keynote of wise legislation.[1] We say this, not as if we had expected that the Code of Canon Law would fail in moderation, but for the reasons which follow. Modern criminology is too moderate; it even eliminates the very notion of penalty. This is due to an inevitable reaction. Legislators had not always followed wise moderation or sufficiently considered the physical and psychological condition of the delinquent. With regard to this point, and more especially the treatment of youthful delinquents, the modern theories of criminology deserve some consideration. On the other hand these theories cannot claim universal, either scientific or dogmatic, acceptance. For they are based on mere assumptions and neglect sound philosophical principles, [1] This is true of all, including prohibition laws, notwithstanding the purely technical decision of the U. S. Supreme Court.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google which must necessarily lead to a sceptic attitude on the part of jurists as well as philosophers.

The "Modern Theories of Criminality"[2] are crystallized in two materialistic views, viz.: determinism and transformism or natural selection. They investigate the causes of crimes and then try to find preventive remedies for them. As to what crime is, they neglect to define. Ferri says crime is "a phenomenon of complex origin and the result of biological, physical, and social conditions."[3] The criminal, "being the product of cosmic, biological, or social influences which put him out of harmony with conventional morality and cause him to disturb the recognized aims of community existence, must be treated as a ward of the State for the purpose of curing his impairment and meanwhile keeping him sufficiently restrained so as to prevent injury to others."[4] But "the old and still dominant thought is, as to cause, that a crime is caused by the inscrutable moral free will of the human being, doing or not doing the crime, just as it pleases."[5] The criminal type, therefore, either natural, or occasional, or emotional, or social, or whatever it be — for there is a remarkable variety of hues and shades and colorings among the various propounders,— is rather a creation or miscreation of nature for which the criminal cannot be held responsible. Imputability is eliminated. Consequently, away with jails and penitentiaries;[6] convert them into state asylums, and abolish penal laws

2 This is the title of a book published by C. Bernaldo de Quirós, translated into English by Alfonso de Salvio, Ph.D., Boston, 1912.

3 L. c., p. 21.

4 L. c., p. xv.

5 L. c., p. viii.

6 L. c., p. 170.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

completely. That the penal code must undergo a radical change is evident on the basis of this theory. "The public in general and the legal profession in particular," we are told, "have remained either ignorant of the entire subject or indifferent to the entire scientific movement, and this ignorance or indifference has blocked the way to progress in administration." [7]

There we are. Inferiority is the signature of the "deeply imbedded tradition," because science is monopolized by modern criminologists. But natural selection has received a rather severe blow from modern science, and the free will theory is not easily disposed of yet. Even the criminologists find it rather difficult to fix responsibility. "This constantly debated question is proving unusually troublesome for our contemporaries who have not been able to look at it from the correct point of view." [8]

The "classical theory," as the modern theorists benignly call the traditional, which is also the Catholic view, assumes a moral and social responsibility, based upon the notions of obligation, free will, and personality.

It is not our task to refute determinism, i.e., the theory that the human will is not free and that all man's acts, including those that are apparently free, are adequately and inevitably determined by their antecedents. We leave this to the philosophers.[9] What must be especially emphasized here is the connection existing be-

7 L. c., p. ix.
8 L. c., p. 142.
9 See for instance, Urráburu, Inst. Phil., Psych., III. 1898, p. 222 ff.; Mercier, A Manual of Modern Scholastic Philosophy (Engl. tr.), 1916, Vol. I, p. 265 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tween guilt and penalty and the various purposes of the latter illustrated in the course of our Commentary. We pay no special attention here to the right of the Church to employ coercion, for this shall be set forth under can. 2214. But one thing needs stressing, namely, that the sentimentality of modern criminologists is not conducive to public welfare. It would be much better for our legislators to borrow correct ideas from the penal code of the Church, which is at the same time a specimen of true moderation and of the spirit in which penal laws ought to be made and executed.

Concerning the sources (fontes) of the penal code, it must be understood above all that the ancient sources now have only an interpretative value (see can. 6). For the Code is the sole authentic source of ecclesiastical law, to the exclusion of all others, whether found singly or in collections. Single penal laws were enacted at particular as well as general councils, and some of them found their way into collections.[10] Gratian's Decree contains penal laws dispersed throughout, and an attempt at systematic treatment is made in Causae I–III. The fifth book of the Decretals is more compactly, though not exclusively, penal, as may be seen from title 33 on privileges. After the "classical" period of Canon Law no systematic digest of the penal law was attempted,—if we except the so-called "Reserved Cases" in the Bull "In Coena Domini," — until the time of Pius IX. This Pontiff revised the penal law, as far as censures are concerned, in his well-known Constitution "Apostolicae Sedis," of Oct. 12, 1869.

Other penal laws were scattered in the papal constitu-

10 Here the Penitential Books may be cited, e.g., Wasserschleben, Die Bussbücher der abendländ. Kirche, 1851; Schmitz, Die Bussbücher und Bussdisciplin der Kirche, 1883.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tions that emanated from time to time after the Clementine Collection, i. e., after 1317. Among these the one called "Ad vitanda scandala," of Martin V (1418) is of special importance because of the distinction it makes between excommunicati vitandi and tolerati. Otherwise, as stated above, no exhaustive and complete redaction was attempted until the promulgation of the new Code.

The Code has taken cognizance of the postulates of the French and German Bishops at the Vatican Council, who wished to see the number of censures and reserved papal cases diminished.[11] A comparison with the "Apostolicae Sedis" shows this. Besides, the formulation of the present penal laws has been modified to such an extent that only a few former texts have been inserted entirely (ex integro) in the new Code. This should serve as a caution to the reader who is tempted to follow the old interpreters.

The literature on the penal laws of the Church is considerable, though now-a-days antiquated for more than one reason. Besides the commentaries on Book V of the Decretals, there are some specific treatises which deserve mention. They are:

C. A. THESAURUS, S. J., De Poenis Ecclesiasticis, 1640, re-published with notes and additional laws up to the year 1760, by Ubaldus Giraldi, whose edition of 1831 we use;

F. SUAREZ, Disputationes de Censuris, etc., Paris edition of 1861, t. xxiii;

F. KOBER, Der Kirchenbann nach den Grundsätzen des

11 Cfr. Granderath-Kirch, Geschichte des Vatik. Konzils, 1903, Vol. I, p. 441, p. 444; U. Stutz, Der Geist des Codex Iuris Canonici, 1918, p. 153 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Kanonischen Rechtes, 1863; ID., Die Suspension der Kirchendiener, 1862; ID., Das Interdict, in the Archiv für kath. K-R., 1869.

Since the promulgation of the "Apostolicae Sedis," 1869, the following commentaries have been published:

D'ANNIBALE, Commentarius in Const. Apostolicae Sedis, Prati, 1894.

AVANZINI, De Constitutione Ap. Sedis, Romae 1883.

HILARIUS a SEXTEN, Tractatus de Censuris Ecclesiasticis cum Appendice de Irregularitate, Moguntiae 1898.

PENNACHI, Commentaria in Const. Ap. Sedis, 1883.

Of a more general character are the following works:

P. HINSCHIUS, Das Kirchenrecht der Katholiken und Protestanten in Deutschland, Vol. IV, 1888; V, 1895; VI, 1897. The author, being a non-Catholic, could not always free himself from prejudice, but none the less his work is a fountainhead of historical and practical knowledge.

SMITH, Elements of Eccl. Law, Vol. III, ed. 3, N. Y. (s. a.) Useful for the student of secular criminal law is:

KENNY-WEBB, Outlines of Criminal Law, New York, 1907.

Worthy of especial mention are:

J. HOLLWECK, Die kirchlichen Strafgesetze, 1899. He formulates the whole penal law into 301 paragraphs and then offers a commentary on the same.[12]

F. WERNZ, S. J., who entitles Vol. VI of his Ius

12 Msgr. Hollweck was an active member of the Commission on the Penal Code. We remember his telling us how difficult it was to arrange these canons. "It is," he said, "like taking a stone out of a building if you remove one censure or the other." We notice that Hollweck's arrangement has been adopted by the Code.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Decretalium, Ius Poenale Ecclesiae Catholicae, Rome 1913.

M. LEGA, De Iudiciis Eccl., Vols. III et IV, 1906 ff.

Since the promulgation of the Code there have been issued:

H. A. AYRINHAC, Penal Legislation, N. Y. 1920.

F. M. CAPPELLO, S. J., De Censuris iuxta Cod. I. C., 1919.

E. EICHMANN, Das Strafrecht des Codex I. C., 1920.

A. PERATHONER, Auditor S. R. R., Kirchliches Gerichtswesen und kirchl. Strafrecht, 1919 (for the most part only a translation of the respective canons of the Code).

J. SOLE, De Delictis et Poenis, Rome 1920.

Our Code divides the whole fifth book into three parts, as follows:

Part I: De Delictis
1. Nature of crime and its division.
2. Imputability and circumstances.
3. Attempted crimes.

Part II: De Poenis
1. Nature, kinds, interpretation, application.
2. Power of inflicting penalties.
3. Subjects of penalties.
4. Pardoning power.
5. Censures in general and particular: excommunication, interdict, suspension.
6. Vindictive penalties for clergymen in general and in particular.
7. Penal remedies and penances.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Part III: De Poenis in Singula Delicta

1. Crimes against faith and the unity of the Church.
2. Crimes against religion.
3. Crimes against ecclesiastical authorities, persons, and things.
4. Crimes against life, liberty, property, good name and morals.
5. Crimen falsi, or forgery of documents.
6. Crimes in the administration and reception of orders and other Sacraments.
7. Crimes against the clerical and religious state.
8. Crimes in conferring, receiving and dismissing ecclesiastical dignities, offices and benefices.
9. Abuse of ecclesiastical power or office.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PART I

ON CRIMES

TITLE I

NATURE AND DIVISION OF CRIME

CAN. 2195

§ 1. Nomine delicti, iure ecclesiastico, intelligitur externa et moraliter imputabilis legis violatio cui addita sit sanctio canonica saltem indeterminata.

§ 2. Nisi ex adiunctis aliud appareat, quae dicuntur de delictis, applicantur etiam violationibus praecepti cui poenalis sanctio adnexa sit.

CAN. 2196

Qualitas delicti desumenda est ex obiecto legis; quantitas vero dimetienda non solum ex diversa gravitate legis laesae, sed etiam ex maiore minoreve imputabilitate aut damno illato.

CAN. 2197

Delictum est:

1.° Publicum, si iam divulgatum est aut talibus contigit seu versatur in adiunctis ut prudenter iudicari possit et debeat facile divulgatum iri;

2.° Notorium notorietate iuris, post sententiam iudicis competentis quae in rem iudicatam transierit

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

aut post confessionem delinquentis in iudicio factam ad normam can. 1750;

3.° Notorium notorietate facti, si publice notum sit et in talibus adiunctis commissum, ut nulla tergiversatione celari nulloque iuris suffragio excusari possit;

4.° Occultum, quod non est publicum; occultum materialiter, si lateat delictum ipsum; occultum formaliter, si eiusdem imputabilitas.

CAN. 2198

Delictum quod unice laedit Ecclesiae legem, natura sua, sola ecclesiastica auctoritas persequitur, requisito interdum, ubi eadem auctoritas necessarium vel opportunum iudicaverit, auxilio brachii saecularis; delictum quod unice laedit legem societatis civilis, iure proprio, salvo praescripto can. 120, punit civilis auctoritas, licet etiam Ecclesia sit in illud competens ratione peccati; delictum quod laedit utriusque societatis legem, ab utraque potestate puniri potest.

The Code first defines crime, then describes its qualities and guilt, and then enumerates the various kinds of crimes, so far as the forum internum and externum, the ecclesiastical and civil court, are concerned.

A crime, in ecclesiastical law, is an external and morally imputable transgression of a law to which is attached a canonical sanction, at least in general.

1. Delictum is taken from the word delinquere (de and linquere, to forsake, to leave, to omit) and means an offence in the general sense. However, by common usage the term is restricted to a public offence or crime against the juridical order or law. Therefore it is called a transgression of the law, whether divine or human, i. e., merely ecclesiastical. It is the law, either eternal or positive, that governs order, the relation of man to God and of man to man, and any defection from that order constitutes a frustration of the designs of Providence.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2. But the transgression which the ecclesiastical law considers is not merely the guilty mind (mens rea), but the act,—i. e., an outward manifestation of a vicious intention, or a breach of the law as externally apprehensible. This may be positive or negative, or, in other words, it may consist in an act or in an omission. Thus a sacrilege is a positive act, but neglect of pastoral duties is an omission. It is essential to the notion of delictum that it be an external act, either of speech or deed, although it need not necessarily be provable.

3. Externality, however, does not exclude imputability, and hence the definition contains the addition, morally imputable. The vicious act, therefore, presupposes a guilty mind (mens rea).[1] Why? A transgression of the law is an act, and the transgressor, therefore, is an agent, and when that agent is intelligent and free, and acts as such, we say that the effects caused by such an agent are to be imputed or credited to him. Because an intelligent being has dominion over its actions, it is capable of moral proprietorship in the praise or blame justly due to its deliberate acts, according as they are seen to be good or bad.[2] In this feature crime shares the notion of sin, for every crime is a sin, though not conversely. For a sin (e. g., mental apostasy or heresy) may be committed by the mind only, whereas a crime supposes an external act.

1 English lawyers for nearly 800 years have been familiar with the maxim: "Actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea," the origin of which is attributed to St. Augustine; see Kenny-Webb, Outlines of Criminal Law, 1907, p. 33.

2 W. Hill, S. J., Ethics, 8th ed., p. 47.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

It may be asked whether imputability is required under all conditions. In general there is no doubt that every crime supposes personal imputability. An apparent exception seems to be the local interdict, which may affect guilty as well as innocent persons. But provision for these is made by can. 2276.

A more serious objection might arise from the existence of pure penal laws, which many moralists assert. However, in the first place, it would have to be proved that these laws really are laws. We cannot regard the prohibition of wine and beer, for instance, as a true law, because it neither pertains to reason nor is it intended for the public good, unless we identify the latter with the aims of fanatics. Secondly, it would have to be proved that the conscience does not feel guilty at all in transgressing such penal laws, e. g., the constitutions of religious communities. No matter what the constitutions may say, it is a solemn and certain fact that religious do feel the sting of conscience when they transgress the rules laid down.[3] Be that as it may, the Code does not contain a single purely penal law.

4. But what does the addition "cui addita sit sanctio canonica saltem indeterminata" mean? The transgression is accompanied by penal sanction, at least in general terms. This means that there is neither crime nor punishment without a penal law.[4] It is, therefore, as stated above, the law which is infringed and which punishes. Superficially considered, this appears quite plausible and perhaps sufficient. Yet there are some philosophico-

3 On this question see Tübinger Quartalschrift, 1900, pp. 204–281; 1902, pp. 574–620. Layman, S. J., appears to hit the nail on the head when he says: "Si recte attendimus, eiusmodi constitutiones aut ordinationes non sunt proprie leges." (Theol. Moral., l. I, tr. 4, c. 15, n. 1.)

4 "Nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege poenali," was the adage of the School; Eichmann, l. c., p. 27.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

juridical questions involved in this simple answer. Thus it may be asked, why the law punishes certain transgressions, while it leaves others unpunished? Take, for instance, the reading of forbidden books, which is not punished generally (can. 1395), but only in particular cases (can. 2318); hunting by clergymen (can. 138), etc. Yet these forbidden actions cannot be called crimes in the sense of the ecclesiastical law.

There is another element implied in the word crime: it means a serious violation of the public or social order, which, when disturbed, requires reparation. We may indeed say that punitiveness or non-punitiveness forms a test between civil and criminal procedure, or between crimes proper and civil offences, and may even add, as a further distinction the legal power of remitting the sanction, yet the intrinsic and doubtless first intended demarcation is the amount or degree of social disturbance.[5] Sin may be a merely ethical transgression, but crime will ever be an ethico-juridical offence against the order established by law, and declared punishable at least in general terms.

The sanctio canonica indeterminata signifies a penalty to be meted out according to the good pleasure of the judge or superior (can. 2217, § I, n. I). It follows that, although no special penalty is provided for the transgression of a law, yet if that law embodies the provision that the punishment of the transgressor is left to the prudent judgment of the Ordinary, this is sufficient to mark the transgression as a crime, provided the other necessary marks are not wanting. Instances of this kind are enumerated in can. 2170, 2183, and 2391. There is one exception to this general rule, however, viz., can. 2222, § 1, which, as shall be seen, is nothing but an external corroboration of the idea of reparation and the supreme law of the Church, viz., the welfare of souls.

5 Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 3, enters upon this question thoroughly, yet when he says that the final distinction between civil and criminal lies "in the legal power of remitting the sanction" (l. c., p. 15 f.) he seems to beg the question; for unless we assume that legal power to be absolute, it cannot remit penal sanction ad libitum or without the supposition of justice or some kind of law.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2 of can. 2195 ascribes the criminal character also to the violation or the non-observance of a precept given under a penal sanction. A specimen of such a precept is that mentioned in can. 2173 and 2176. But the precept must have been duly given and intimated according to can. 2310. Besides, the essential features of a crime must not be sacrificed in these violations, which consequently must be external and imputable.

Can. 2196 establishes the quality and determines the grievousness of crimes (qualitas et quantitas). Moralists, when speaking of the different species of sin, are wont to lay down a threefold rule for determining them. Two of these rules coincide with the quality of crime stated in the first clause of our canon. Crimes differ from one another in quality by reason of the different objects of the law. However, since every law has in view special acts, it is evident that crimes differ specifically according to their formal objects. Thus the crimes against faith and unity of the Church differ from those against religion, even though faith belongs to religion,[6] the sins against property and life differ from one another, although all are directed against the virtue of justice, because they are morally specified by their formal objects.

The gravity of a crime depends on the conditions mentioned, viz., the objective gravity or importance of the law violated, the greater or less imputability, and the damage done. The objective gravity of a law can easily be gauged by the gravity of the penalty attached to it. A law provided with a penal sanction (lex perfecta) is manifestly more important than a law destitute of such a sanction. Besides, the subjective condition of the transgressor must be considered, of which more under Title II. Lastly, an action which might be considered less weighty in its nature and on account of diminished imputability, might still entail very serious consequences[7] and thus enhance responsibility. English and American criminal law distinguishes between indictable and petty offences, and the former are classified as treasons, felonies, and misdemeanors.[8] There can be no doubt that this law is bottomed on the natural distinction of heinousness. Consequently, also, the procedure is different.

[6] See can. 2314, 2319, and can. 2320–2329.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PUBLICITY OF CRIMES

Can. 2197 distinguishes three kinds of crimes,— public, notorious, and occult.

1. A crime is public if committed under, or accompanied by, circumstances which point to a possible and likely divulgation thereof. Canonists[9] enumerate different degrees of publicity: almost occult (pene occultum), which is known to at least two witnesses; famosum or manifestum, which not only can be proved, but is known to many; and, finally, notorium. From this it will be seen that a real intrinsic distinction be-

7 Take, for instance, an operation performed by an unskilled surgeon or midwife, or an innocent hunting trip by a clergyman.

8 Cfr. Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 84 ff. The French law distinguishes crimes, délits, contraventions; the German: Verbrechen, Vergehen, Uebertretungen; the Roman: facta, dicta, scripta, consilia; l. 16, Dig. 48, 16; see c. 19, Dist. 1, de Poenit.

9 Reiffenstuel, V, 1, 241 ff.; Schmalzgrueber, V, 1, n. 1 ff.; Hollweck, l. c., p. 67 f.; Wernz, l. c., VI, n. 17, p. 21.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tween a public crime and a crime notorious in fact can hardly be established.[10] (We shall point out one distinctive trait below.) To fix the number of persons required for making a crime a public one[11] is rather hazardous, though it may furnish a certain rule which will enable the judge to decide as to the secrecy or public character of a crime. Many canonists hold that at least six persons in a community, even the smallest (for instance, a religious house of 10 or 12 inmates), must know of a crime, to render it public.[12] Nor should there be any doubt about the character of the persons who are witnesses to the crime. Furthermore, the interest they may have in the crime should be weighed.[13]

2. A crime is notorious by notoriety of law (notorietate iuris) if it has become an adjudged matter, according to can. 1902–1904, or judicially confessed, according to can. 1750. Extrajudicial confessions do not render a crime notorious by notoriety of law. Here we must take issue with the assertion that the Code acknowledges such confessions. Thus it has been stated[14] that it would be a notorium juris if the bishop or vicar-general would catch a clergyman in flagranti! The Code contains nothing to that effect, but requires (can. cit.) a confession before the judge sitting in court.

A crime is notorious notorietate facti when it is pub-

10 The sources are not consistent; see c. 17, C. 2, q. 1; c. 8, X, III, 2, where the notorium is called publicum and manifestum.

11 Wernz, l. c., VI, p. 22, note 35.

12 Reiffenstuel, V, 1, n. 252; unless, he says, it has been committed in the presence of the competent authority who enjoys power in foro externo.

13 Eichmann, l. c., p. 32; for instance, in adultery.

14 Hollweck, l. c., p. 67, note 4, quotes Reiffenstuel, V, 1, 267; but Reiffenstuel is cautious enough not to make such a general statement, for he demands that the judge surprise the delinquent before witnesses. This is evident, otherwise the judge would at the same time be the accuser. That the pastor does not constitute a public person in judiciary matters is clear.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

licly known and has been committed under such circumstances that it cannot be concealed by any artifice or be excused by any legal assumption or circumstantial evidence. The term nulla tergiversatione celari is equivalent to the other used in the Decretals.[15] The second clause refers to imputability, which may be lessened by extenuating circumstances, according to can. 2201–2206. Hence not only the fact itself must be notorious, but also its criminal character.[16] Thus, for instance, the fact of alienation may easily be proved by a legal deed, but whether it was criminal must be ascertained by other means; because it may be that the administrator or procurator had due permission and therefore acted lawfully. It is this element of inexcusability or of knowledge of the criminal character of the deed that appears to distinguish a public from a notorious crime. For the text manifestly lays stress on divulgation with regard to public crimes and emphasizes the criminal character as known and inexcusable.

3. Every crime which is not public, says our text, is occult or secret. The Code distinguishes a twofold secrecy, viz.: merely material (materialiter occultum), which exists when the fact is unknown, or known only to the perpetrator and a few reticent persons; and formal (formaliter occultum), when the moral and juridical guilt is unknown. An example may illustrate the distinction. If a percussor clericorum beats a pastor at night, his identity may remain unknown, though the effects point to a crime; if the priest was beaten in a public row, there may be a reasonable doubt as to the real perpetrator. The authors,[17] therefore, assumed that a crime committed at night could not be notorious or public. However,

15 C, 10, X, III, 2.
16 Reiffenstuel, V, 1, n. 265; Hollweck, l. c., p. 68.
17 Schmalzgrueber, V, 1, n. 5.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

this theory cannot be accepted in this general sense. Take, for instance, a sacrilegious burglary.[18] If a sufficient number of persons witnessed such a crime and recognized the perpetrator, the crime could not be styled occult. Neither does it seem true that a duel is always a secret crime, as some maintain.[19] For although duels are generally held in a secret place, yet there are, as a rule, witnesses and signs which admit of a perfectly safe judgment that a duel has taken place.[20]

ECCLESIASTICAL, CIVIL, AND MIXED CRIMES

The Code does not distinguish between private and public crimes, as far as prosecution is concerned, but it draws a line of demarkation between ecclesiastical, civil, and mixed crimes.

As ecclesiastical crimes were acknowledged manifest and serious transgressions of the law of the Church,[21] and as typically canonical crimes were considered: homicide, moechia, and apostasy. However it would be vain to look for a fixed list of so-called ecclesiastical crimes. The fact is that, since the fourth and fifth centuries, besides the three above named crimes, usury, simony, crimen falsi, and intercourse with excommunicated persons were also adjudged by the ecclesiastical courts.[22] The Decretals enumerate quite a list of crimes subject to ecclesiastical judicature: apostasy, heresy, usury, simony, sacrilege, incest, adultery, bigamy, usurpation of ecclesiastical power, and so forth, so that the whole Decalogue was more or

18 Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 171.

19 Hollweck, l. c., p. 68, note 3.

20 When students enter the schoolroom with seared and bandaged faces and smelling from carbolic acid, there seem to be "loud" signs, nor do they, as a rule, make any secret of the duel.

21 Cfr. cc. 21, 22, C. 11, q. 3.

22 Cfr. Hinschius, l. c., IV, p. 746.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

less included.[23] This is not surprising, since, with the exception of purely political crimes, the others were all taken to imply the ratio peccati, which the Church is certainly competent to judge.[24] Our Code greatly reduces this list, as may be seen from the bare enumeration of the titles, viz., Title XI, Title XIII, and Titles XVI-XIX.

Crimes that violate an ecclesiastical law are prosecuted by ecclesiastical authority, as the nature of the crime, and, we may add, the nature of the Church as an autonomous society, require. If the Church should deem it necessary, or opportune, she may ask for the assistance of the secular power. This aid, of course, will be offered by the State only in countries where the separation of the two societies has not yet become an accomplished fact, and where the mutual relations of both are regulated by concordats.

The text: "requisito interdum auxilio brachii saecularis," has a diplomatic tinge. Formerly, e. g., in the time of Innocent III or Boniface VIII, it went without saying that the State was obliged to lend a helping hand to the Church. The secular sword was supposed to be at the disposal of the Church (ad nutum ecclesiae) and the Roman Pontiffs did not hesitate to remind rulers of their duty. Thus heretical disturbances, which usually caused also civic disorders, were frequently quelled by the civil authority at the request of the Church.[25] The same course was taken in prosecuting those who attacked ecclesiastical personages of higher rank.[26]

The separation of State and Church, brought about by 23 See lib. V, Decretal.; Eichmann, l. c., p. 13.

24 C. 13, Novit., X, II, 13. Even political crimes were looked upon as heinous and had to be considered as such because of the intimate relation between Church and State.

25 Cfr. cc. 9, 13, x, V, 7; c. 11, 6°, V, 2; see Scholz, Publizistik zur Zeit Philipps des Schönen und Bonifaz VIII. (Stutz, K.-R. Abhandl.)

26 See c. 5, 6°, V, 9.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the religious breach of the XVIth century, lessened the influence of the spiritual upon the temporal society. Royal absolutism grew jealous of the power of the Church and fomented aversion towards her in quarters which had every reason to sustain her authority. Thus it came about that the rights of the Church were often trampled under foot and she had no longer the means to enforce them. This is an actual condition, but it is not the proper relation intended by the Governor of the Universe, who desires peaceful and harmonious coöperation between the two societies, sovereign in their respective spheres.[27] Hence it is that the Church still claims the right of being helped and supported in the attainment of her ends. Evil-doers in the bosom of the Church can hardly be desirable citizens, and permanent tranquillity can be established only by the elimination of disorderly elements. This requires a firm and effective means of righting wrong whenever it makes itself felt, even in the ecclesiastical order, and the civil power should be aware that the civil order must necessarily suffer if and whenever the ecclesiastical order is seriously disturbed.

Whilst the Church claims the right of punishing crimes of a merely ecclesiastical character and of invoking the civil power in the exercise of this right, she avoids interference in the prosecution of merely civil crimes, such as treason, revolution, counterfeiting, evading the payment of duties and taxes, etc. These crimes fall within the exclusive purview of the State, provided the clerical privilege is safeguarded according to can. 120, where it has not been abolished by concordats or lawful custom. But the text adds: "although the Church, too, would be competent concerning such crimes, in as far as moral guilt is concerned" For moral guilt touches the soul and consequently the salvation of men, which belongs to the spiritual power. Just here it may be perceived how well the State would fare if it coöperated with the Church. The authority of the State would be greatly strengthened, men would realize that a crime against the civil authority is abhorred also by the representative of Him from whom all power is derived,[28] and thus be made to understand that they are not mere cogs in a machine, but responsible members of an organism which has the spiritual power behind it.

27 See Leo XIII, "Immortale Dei," Nov. 1, 1885.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A third class of crimes is called mixed. It comprises such crimes as offend against the moral-juridical order of both societies. Both Church and State are interested in the prosecution of crimes which include offences against religion in general, as mentioned in Title XII, crimes committed against life, liberty, property, good name and morals, as stated in Title XIV, forgers of official documents, as mentioned in can. 2362, because ecclesiastical documents may also serve state purposes.[29] These mixed crimes may be prosecuted by both the civil and the ecclesiastical power, with due regard to prevention [30] and to the ruling of can. 1933, § 3, concerning laymen, who, after being duly punished by the civil authority, should not be prosecuted by the Church.

28 Rom. 13, 1.

29 Cfr. Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 241; most of the so-called mixed crimes are also mentioned in the civil code (ibid.).

30 See can. 1553, § 2; can. 1568.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE II

IMPUTABILITY, AGGRAVATING OR EXTENUATING CIRCUMSTANCES, AND JURIDICAL EFFECTS OF CRIME

Imputability was explained above as moral proprietorship in the praise or blame justly due to deliberate acts performed by a free agent. Hence a crime, to be imputable, must proceed from a deliberate intention, which presupposes knowledge and free will. The Code first explains imputability in general and the excusing, extenuating or aggravating influences bearing upon it, then sets forth some circumstances or conditions of this influence, in particular, the aggravating circumstances, then concurrence in crime, and, lastly, its juridical effects.

IMPUTABILITY IN GENERAL

Can. 2199

Imputabilitas delicti pendet ex dolo delinquentis vel ex eiusdem culpa in ignorantia legis violatae aut in omissione debitae diligentiae; quare omnes causae quae augent, minuunt, tollunt dolum aut culpam, eo ipso augent, minuunt, tollunt delicti imputabilitatem.

Can. 2200

§ 1. Dolus heic est deliberata voluntas violandi legem, eique opponitur ex parte intellectus defectus cognitionis et ex parte voluntatis defectus libertatis.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Posita externa legis violatione, dolus in foro externo praesumitur, donec contrarium probetur.

The imputability of a crime depends on two essential conditions of the perpetrator, viz., (1) deliberation (dolus), and (2) speculative or practical guilt (culpa). Dolus or malice is here taken as the deliberate will of transgressing the law, as opposed to lack of knowledge on the part of the intellect, and to deficiency on the part of the will. This follows from the complex nature of human acts which require knowledge as well as will ("nihil volitum nisi cognitum") [1] and hence, where the voluntary element is entirely wanting, there can be neither dolus nor culpa, and where volition is impeded, this defect diminishes the guilt.

But the text adds (can. 2200, § 2), that if the fact of the violation of a law is certain, the intention or dolus is presumed until the contrary is proved. Hence the proof of ignorance rests on the perpetrator. This is also recognized by civil law. For criminal liability may exist even though the offender had no intention to commit the particular crime which he did in fact commit, and consequently it suffices to commit any crime, whatever it may have been. [2] This is the meaning of the legal maxim: "Ignorance of fact, not of the law, excuses." [3] How far deliberation and knowledge may affect culpability or immunity from criminal punishment depends on the mental condition of the perpetrator, but also on the wording of the law, as is evident from can. 2228 f. This supposes that for any punishable act there are required:

1 Cfr. S. Thomas, Summa Theol., I–II, q. 6; W. Hill, Ethics, 8th ed., p. 46; according to general usage in English, the term voluntary means free.

2 Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 36.

3 Reg. Iuris 18 in 6°; cfr. Reg. Iuris 23 in 6°: "Sine culpa, nisi subsit causa, non est aliquis puniendus."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Knowledge that what the offender is doing is criminal, and will or power of volition, i. e., the offender must be able to abstain from doing what he does: if either condition fails, immunity from criminal punishment will arise. This is sound theological as well as juridical doctrine, provided always that the law may add a specific clause as to the degree of knowledge or malice, as can. 2229 plainly indicates.[4]

The culpa, as distinguished from the dolus, may arise from ignorance and carelessness. Concerning ignorance, see can. 2202. The omissio debitae diligentiae may be the result of carelessness, or of negligence, or of thoughtlessness. Different occupations and conditions require more or less diligence.

Thoughtlessness must, however, be in one or the other way connected with volition or the exercise of the will, or what the theologians call voluntarium in causa. For in order to render an act imputable it is required that the evil effect be foreseen, at least in a general or confused way, that the agent had it in his power or was free to posit the cause, and, lastly, that there was an obligation to avoid the evil effect that followed the cause.

Any act, therefore, which is not a human act, viz., one that does not proceed from reason and free will, cannot be imputed to a human agent. But since either reason or free will may be affected, not entirely, but partially, the degree of imputability or guilt is proportionate to the mental state in which the agent was at the time he committed the criminal act. Hence, § 2 of can. 2199 very appropriately states that every cause that increases, diminishes, or takes away the dolus or culpa, also 4 Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 35. If the law determines no further degree of dolus or culpa, it is understood that the degree required for constituting a mortal sin is sufficient. Hollweck, l. c., p. 75, note 6.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google increases, diminishes, or takes away responsibility for the delictum. This, of course, presupposes the existence and exercise of freewill, but it does not exclude the possibility of so-called biological or physiological influences on the morality of human acts. No psychologist denies the possible alteration of the ethical element by reason of the composite nature of man. An eminent philosopher has stated it as follows: "That there are certain unfortunate individuals who, owing to mental derangement, are irresponsible, is beyond doubt and has never been disputed. That there are others who, while able to form correct judgments on speculative matters, are incapable of resisting solicitations to evil, does not contradict any point of our doctrine but seems rather to be established by experience. It may not be even impossible that there exists, as Lombroso professed, 'a criminal type,' that is to say, monsters irresistibly given over to crime who can be recognized by certain anatomical, physiological, and pathological characteristics. Such characteristics are to be found more or less numerous among most criminals. Further, we may also admit, though the experiments on which this assertion rests must be viewed with caution, that a person may under the influence of hypnotic suggestion lose the use of his liberty. All these facts are not incompatible with the theory of free-will, as the exception does not disprove the rule." [5]

DEFECTUS COGNITIONIS

Can. 2201

§ 1. Delicti sunt incapaces qui actu carent usu rationis.

[5] D. Mercier, A Manual of Modern Scholastic Philosophy, Engl. Transl., 1917, Vol. II, p. 225 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Habitualiter amentes, licet quandoque lucida intervalla habeant, vel in certis quibusdam ratiocinationibus vel actibus sani videantur, delicti tamen incapaces praesumuntur.

§ 3. Delictum in ebrietate voluntaria commissum aliqua imputabilitate non vacat, sed ea minor est quam cum idem delictum committitur ab eo qui sui plene compos sit, nisi tamen ebrietas apposite ad delictum patrandum vel excusandum quaesita sit; violata autem lege in ebrietate involuntaria, imputabilitas exsulat omnino, si ebrietas usum rationis adimat ex toto; minuitur, si ex parte tantum. Idem dicatur de aliis similibus mentis perturbationibus.

§ 4. Debilitas mentis delicti imputabilitatem minuit, sed non tollit omnino.

Can. 2202

§ 1. Violatio legis ignoratae nullatenus imputatur, si ignorantia fuerit inculpabilis; secus imputabilitas minuitur plus minusve pro ignorantiae ipsius culpabilitate.

§ 2. Ignorantia solius poenae imputabilitatem delicti non tollit, sed aliquantum minuit.

§ 3. Quae de ignorantia statuuntur, valent quoque de inadvertentia et errore.

The degree of imputability is in proportion to the degree of dolus and culpa. Dolus or intention supposes a normal condition of the reasoning faculties, which in turn depends on organic conditions, which may be either actual or habitual, i. e., more or less permanent. Besides, even in a normal condition ignorance may play a part in forming an imputable judgment. Can. 2201 treats of abnormal organic conditions, whilst can. 2202 has ignorance in view.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1. Incapable of committing a crime are those who are actually deprived or destitute of the use of reason. Hence acts committed in sleep or in a frenzied or furious state of mind cannot be imputed.[6] The text also includes insanity.

2. Those habitually insane[7] are presumed to be incapable of committing a crime, even though they may have lucid moments or may appear sane as to certain processes of reasoning or certain acts. Insanity is a disturbance of the mental faculties and, as such, influences the legal aspect of crime. Modern criminologists attribute insanity to pathological conditions and speak of the epileptic, the neurasthenic, and the psychopathic states.[8] Moral insanity, so-called, "in which all the upright sentiments are eliminated, while the intelligence presents no disorders,"[9] is inadmissible and de facto rejected in American and English law. There are, on the other hand, different degrees of mental unsoundness, but "the very difficult practical question as to where the line of demarcation should be drawn" is yet unsolved.[10] Two classes of mentally unsound persons are: (a) lunatics over whom the threats and prohibitions of the criminal law exercise no control; and (b) those whose insanity is so slight that they would not yield to it if a policeman were at their elbow.[11] This rather technical distinction has been accepted by jurists ever since the case of Daniel McNaughten, A. D. 1843. We quote the replies given by the

6 Cfr. cc. 1, 3, Dist. 6.

7 C. 12, C. 15, q. 1, would inflict a milder penance after the return of normal conditions, which is inconsistent with our Code.

8 De Quirós, l. c., p. 52 ff.

9 Ibid., p. 9.

10 Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 48.

11 Ibid.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

judges, because they not only are the norm of modern criminal law, but are also, to some extent, in accord with our Code.

(I) Every man is presumed to be sane, and to possess a sufficient use of reason to be responsible for his crime, until the contrary has been proved to the satisfaction of a jury.

(II) To establish a defence on the ground of insanity, it must be clearly shown that, at the time of committing the act, the party accused was laboring under such defect of reason, from disease of the mind, as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was performing, or if he did know, not to know that what he was doing was wrong.

(III) As to his knowledge of the wrongfulness of the act, the judges say: "If the accused was conscious that the act was one which he ought not to do, and if the act was at the same time contrary to the law of the land, he is punishable." Thus the test is the power of distinguishing between right and wrong, not, as was once supposed, in the abstract, but in regard to the particular act committed.

(IV) When a criminal act is committed by a man under some insane delusion as to the surrounding facts, which conceals from him the true nature of the act he is doing, he will be under the same degree of responsibility as if the facts with respect to which the delusion exists, had been as he imagined them to be.

We say, these principles agree with the new Code to some extent, because on account of the rules governing imputability these rules may be accepted in globo. However, the Code is very liberal in presuming immunity from criminal intent or responsibility, even for lesser or intermittent insanity. But this is only a praesumptio iuris and not a praesumptio iuris et de iure.[12] Hence the burden of proof is thrown upon the defendant, i. e., the one accused of crime. The proof of insanity is furnished by the preponderance of evidence. Experts are to be called in and the rules laid down under can. 1762–1805 applied.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

All the persons mentioned in can. 2201, § 2, are to be treated as habitually insane, which, of course, presupposes a morbid disease and not merely an irrational impulse. However, such an impulse, which sometimes takes on the nature of an irresistible force, may only be the symptom of a latent though not violent habitual madness, and in that case it must be treated like habitual insanity, although courts of some states of our country and England exclude it as a plea of defence.[13]

One form of insane impulse is kleptomania, because the impulse to steal really seems to arise from actual insanity.[14]

With regard to hypnotism note that it has not yet become a subject of sufficient judicial consideration to justify the attempt to formulate any rules[15] for it, and hence it must be treated like intoxication and passion, which are to be considered as to their antecedent causes and the intent.

3. Intoxication or drunkenness, if deliberate, does not entirely take away responsibility for a crime committed in that state, although it diminishes imputability, thus rendering the crime less offensive than when committed in the state of complete responsibility, unless indeed the state of intoxication was brought about purposely in order to commit or excuse the crime. Responsibility is to be fixed

12 See can. 1825–1828.
13 Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 52.
14 Ibid.
15 Ibid., p. 55.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

according to the degree of drunkenness, because it is this that determines the measure of voluntariness. But to excuse entirely a deed done in the state of voluntary intoxication would be to excuse one wrongful act by another, which neither the ecclesiastical nor the civil law[16] can permit. For no one is allowed to put himself into a state of irresponsibility or to deprive himself of the use of reason without adequate cause. There is no difference between intoxication produced by alcoholic liquor and the state superinduced by certain drugs, such as opium, morphine, and cocaine. Even blameable drunkenness may sometimes have the effect of diminishing criminal responsibility. Thus it may easily cause a mistake in regard to facts which in itself excuse an otherwise unlawful act. Take, for instance, a percussor clericorum, who in a drunken condition is not aware of the clerical character of his victim. Besides, intoxication may also lessen the guilty intent necessary for a particular crime. Thus murder in the first degree may be reduced to homicide. An exception is intentional drunkenness brought about for the purpose of committing a crime. But this supposes that the criminal had the wicked act in mind before getting drunk. Thus a pregnant woman who drank immoderately to brace herself for committing abortion would have no defence or excuse; on the contrary she would commit two distinct crimes.

The next clause of § 3, can. 2201, mentions involuntary intoxication. This, if it takes away the use of reason, also takes away responsibility, and diminishes imputability in proportion to the diminished use of reason. Biblical examples are well known.[17] Such a state may be caused by malicious companions or by the administration

16 Ibid.

17 Noah, Gen. 9, 20 f.; Lot, Gen. 19, 32 ff.; see c. 9, C. 15, q. 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of alcohol for medical purposes, or by exceptional susceptibility to stimulants. It will be no defence, however, for a person to say that he did not intend to get drunk,[18] although the fact may lessen his imputability in the court of conscience. The degree of responsibility is gauged by the control one has over his reasoning faculties.

The text adds: "Idem dicatur de aliis similibus mentis perturbationibus." These "other similar disturbances of the mind" may be caused by extraordinarily strong emotions of the irascible power. Thus the loss of dear ones may cause a sudden excitement, external natural causes such as fires, earthquakes, shipwrecks, etc., are apt to create a panic, and so forth. Hither also belong spiritistic and hypnotic suggestions and evocations which tend to upset the nerves.

4. Finally the Code says that imbecility of mind lessens, though it does not take away, responsibility. Among imbeciles are reckoned the minus habentes, the half-stupid and, we believe, also such as are physically very weak, because there can be no doubt that great feebleness of the body also affects the mind, no matter of what age the person may be. Concerning age consult can. 2204.

Canon 2202 has in view ignorance, which is not nescience, or absence of all knowledge, but properly means an absence of knowledge that is morally imputable to the free agent.[19] Such ignorance may be culpable or inculpable, and hence our text says

1. That inculpable ignorance of the law renders one immune from responsibility for transgressing it, while culpable ignorance diminishes the degree of imputability

18 Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 55 f.

19 Arregui, Summarium Theol. Moral., 1919, ed. 4, n. 11: "Carentia scientiae moraliter debitae"; cfr. c. 9, X, V, 36: "si scire debuisti."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

only in proportion to the obligation one is under of acquiring the necessary knowledge. Here the distinction between vincible and invincible ignorance is properly employed, whereas the distinction between antecedent and consequent ignorance has little or nothing to do with our text, as all agree that antecedent ignorance is not imputable. Thus if a clergyman goes hunting, he may be reasonably ignorant that hunting is forbidden, because really only the chase in the proper sense is forbidden, not simple hunting. He may also be ignorant about the game laws, and become aware of the unlawfulness of hunting only after a fine has been imposed.

Ignorance is vincible if it can be removed by the use of ordinary means proportionate to the matter and the person who has to employ these means. If it cannot be remedied except by extraordinary means which are required neither by the thing itself nor by the state or vocation of the person who is supposed to be obliged to use such means, ignorance is called invincible.

There are different degrees of vincible ignorance: affected, when one purposely avoids knowing the laws, so as to escape the burden of observing them; supine or crass, when one is ignorant of the law through indolence or carelessness. Both affected and supine ignorance, being consequent, render a crime simply involuntary.[20]

2. Ignorance of the penalty does not take away imputability, but to some extent diminishes it. The reason is that penalty indeed deters from committing a crime too readily, but the mens rea, the remorse of conscience, is 20 Ignorance, if purely affected, approaches dolus, and is still further distant from culpa, as far as this signifies carelessness; but it is related to culpa, inasmuch as it bears upon the necessary or required knowledge of the law; ignorance enters dolus as well as culpa; see c. 102, C. 11, q. 3; concerning penalties see can. 2229.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

there and convicts the perpetrator of sin. However, since the penalty is, as a rule, proportionate to the gravity of the crime, it is but natural that ignorance of the penalty should diminish responsibility. What kind of ignorance is here intended is not explicitly stated. But since the term is used generally, it appears to include both vincible and invincible ignorance, as far as responsibility is concerned, though not as far as incurring the penalty is implied.

3. What has been stated with regard to ignorance, must also be applied to inadvertence and error. Hence if one is not sure that a certain occupation or action may cause harm, he is supposed to be innocent of guilt.[21] The same is true concerning error, for instance, if one is mistaken about the law prohibiting intercourse with excommunicati vitandi, he does not incur the penalty of excommunication.[22] Note, however, that error and inadvertence as well as ignorance excuse from criminal responsibility in a higher or lesser degree according to the wording of the law.[23] For laws which have the clause: scienter praesumpserit, ausus fuerit, require a higher degree of knowledge and attention, and on the other hand excuse more easily from criminal intent. This is a decidedly superior concept of law and responsibility than we find in secular codes. For, according to civil criminologists, a mistake in regard to the law, even though it be inevitable, does not afford an excuse for crime.[24] This is quite intelligible, for the State has in view chiefly the public order.

21 C. 23, C. 22, q. 4: "Hoc est innocentem esse, ignorare quod noceat."

22 C. 102, C. 11, q. 3.

23 Compare can. 2365, 2369, 2371.

24 Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 62.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CARELESSNESS

Can. 2203

§ 1. Si quis legem violaverit ex omissione debitae diligentiae, imputabilitas minuitur pro modo a prudenti iudice ex adiunctis determinando; quod si rem praeviderit, et nihilominus cautiones ad eam evitandam omiserit, quas diligens quivis adhibuisset, culpa est proxima dolo.

§ 2. Casus fortuitus qui praevideri vel cui praeviso occurri nequit, a qualibet imputabilitate eximit.

Carelessness, although it may approach dolus, is, according to Can. 2199, rather to be referred to culpa or lack of attention. But since many circumstances which puzzle the judge may surround the agent as well as the criminal act, he is to decide according to the common or ordinary circumstances. But if carelessness amounts, as it were, to forethought, it is more culpable. The text therefore says, a breach of law committed by omitting the required diligence is less imputable, but the degree of imputability is left to be fixed by the judge, who must weigh all the circumstances. The judge, therefore, is not to set up the law, but to consider whether the act is punishable by law, i. e., whether a law exists that would punish such an act, at least in general.

Diligence is taken here as the contrary of negligence; and therefore omission of it spells negligence, or carelessness, or thoughtlessness, etc. All these terms clearly refer to the intellectual (either speculative or practical) attitude of man with regard to a determined law, e. g., the prohibition of homicide. If the term "debita," is added to diligence, this cannot mean all possible diligence or attention, for to use such is not in the power of man; nor is it the intention of the lawgiver, else we should have to recur to the Sovereign Pontiff in each individual case.[25] Diligence therefore must be gauged by the object itself, ex rei gravitate. For greater diligence is required in important cases than in cases of a less serious nature. Besides, diligence must be applied in proportion to the position or condition of the agent or person, ex qualitate personae. For persons in a responsible position, like prelates, physicians, and lawyers, are justly supposed to employ more attention, and to consider more carefully than ordinary human beings the circumstances and consequences of an action they are about to perform. The general rule is that a man shall omit nothing of his own accord that he can and must do in order to dispel ignorance. Hence it must be in his power and he must be under obligation to dispel noxious ignorance. For instance, can. 1269 states the rules for preserving the Holy Eucharist. Now if a priest to whose care the Blessed Sacrament is committed, would leave the place without taking proper precautions, he would be responsible if a sacrilege were committed through his negligence, and his responsibility would be as great as his thoughtlessness had been.[26]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

But, continues can. 2203, if a person has been able to foresee the event (or effect of an action) and has nevertheless omitted to take the precautions which ordinary diligence would have dictated, carelessness approaches vicious intent or dolus. Thus a clergyman may not be guilty of voluntary homicide if he throws a stone and 25 Ballerini-Palmieri, Opus Theol. Morale, 1892, ed. 2, Vol. I, p. 35, n. 64 ff.

26 See c. 1, X, III, 44; on negligence in civil courts one may find interesting matter in Kenny, A Selection of Cases Illustrative of English Law of Tort, 1904, p. 531 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

kills some one,[27] but if he goes hunting and omits the necessary precautions, he cannot be declared free of guilt in case a stray bullet from his gun kills or injures some one. Similarly, a clergyman exercising surgery (which he should not do) and omitting the necessary precautions or neglecting to acquire the necessary skill, cannot be declared guiltless.[28]

The next case considered by the Code is a casual one, or, as we call it, an accident, something that is not foreseen or, if foreseen, could not be avoided. Such an accident cannot be imputed. For instance, if a woman who has made her escape from her abductor jumps into a river and drowns, she is not considered a suicide who must be deprived of ecclesiastical burial.[29] Thus also a homicide committed in self-defence against an unjust aggressor who could not otherwise be repelled, would not render one liable to excommunication; nor would a woman who suffered abortion by an unlucky fall be subject to the penalty established for that crime.[30] How far carelessness may enter here must be judged according to what was said above on diligence. But the power and obligation there mentioned are a sure indication of the measure of diligence to be used. A fortuitous case, however, presupposes that it could not be foreseen or, at least, that it was unlikely to happen.[31]

27 C. 37, Dist. 50.

28 Cfr. can. 139, § 2; c. 19, X, V, 12.

29 C. 11, X, III, 28; see can. 1240, § 1, n. 3.

30 See c. 3, X, V, 39; can. 2350.

31 C. 25, X, V, 12: a priest intended to build a new church and in tearing down the old one, the roof fell and killed a workingman, who had been warned by the priest.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

AGE

CAN. 2204

Minor aetas, nisi aliud constet, minuit delicti imputabilitatem eoque magis quo ad infantiam propius accedit.

Here only imputability is considered, for the diverse penalties are stated in can. 2230. Unless the contrary is evident, youth diminishes responsibility in proportion to its closeness to infancy. The Roman law regarded impuberes as entirely incapable of dolus.[32] Canon Law, and the Decretals particularly,[33] do not exclude responsibility, but admit that it may be lessened, more especially with regard to the sixth commandment. The Church is also very indulgent to minors (i. e., those who have not yet completed the twentieth year of age) when the right of immunity, or rather the ius asyli is concerned. Thus Clement XIII vindicated this right to minors even in case of homicide; because, he said, full malice cannot be attributed to youths and atrocious crimes are committed by them but rarely.[34] This may have been true at that time, but newspaper reports now-a-days tell a sad story of youthful depravity. Therefore our Code adds: nisi aliud constet, i. e., if malice does not supply the lack of age. Juvenile courts have been established of late years for youthful offenders and they deal with them more leniently than the lay courts were wont to do, not only at the time of Clement XIII, but also up to a comparatively recent date.[35]

32 L. 3, Dig. 47, 10=c. 2, C. 15, q. 1.

33 Cc. 1, 2, X, V, 23.

34 "Quemadmodum," May 25, 1763, § 5 f. (Bull. Rom. Continuatio, ed. Prati, 1862, Vol. IV, p. 754).

35 Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 45 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

VIOLENCE, FEAR, NECESSITY, DETRIMENT

CAN. 2205

§ 1. Vis physica quae omnem adimit agendi facultatem, delictum prorsus excludit.

§ 2. Metus quoque gravis, etiam relative tantum, necessitas, imo et grave incommodum, plerumque delictum, si agatur de legibus mere ecclesiasticis, penitus tollunt.

§ 3. Si vero actus sit intrinsece malus aut vergat in contemptum fidei vel ecclesiasticae auctoritatis vel in animarum damnum, causae, de quibus in § 2, delicti imputabilitatem minuunt quidem, sed non auferunt.

§ 4. Causa legitimae tutelae contra iniustum aggressorem, si debitum servetur moderamen, delictum omnino aufert; secus imputabilitatem tantummodo minuit, sicut etiam causa provocationis.

§ 1. Violence, which takes away all freedom of action, excludes responsibility and consequently the guilt of crime.

Violence means external physical compulsion applied to force one to act against one's own will, as when a young man is haled before the ordaining bishop by his foolish parents. The doctrine of St. Thomas [36] is very clear on this subject. The act of the will is twofold: one is its immediate act, as it were, elicited by it, namely to wish; the other is an act of the will commanded by it, and put into execution by means of some other power, such as to walk and to speak, which are commanded by the will to be executed by means of the motive power. As regards the commanded acts of the will, the actus imperati, 36 Summa Theol., I–II, q. 6, art. 4 et 5; translated by the Fathers of the English Dominican Province, 1914.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the will can suffer violence, in so far as violence can prevent the exterior members from executing the will's command. But as to the will's own proper act, the actus elicitus, violence cannot be done to the will. The reason is that the act of the will is nothing else than an inclination proceeding from the interior principle of knowledge. On the other hand violence or compulsion proceeds from an exterior principle or agent. It is contrary to the nature of the will that it should be subject to compulsion or violence, just as it is contrary to the nature of a natural inclination or movement to be bent in a contrary direction. Violence, therefore, is directly opposed to the voluntary as well as to the natural. For the voluntary and the natural have this in common, that both are from an intrinsic principle; whereas violence is from an extrinsic principle. And for this reason, just as in things of knowledge violence effects something against nature (e. g., a stone thrown upwards); so in things endowed with knowledge it effects something against the will. Now that which is against nature is said to be unnatural; and in like manner that which is against the will is said to be involuntary. Therefore violence causes involuntariness, and consequently an act done under such external influence is no human act, because a human act is always a voluntary act. Violence, in other words, renders an act irresponsible. However, note well, violence must be complete and adequate and referable to the act in question; in other words, there must be a causal connection between the violent act and the act commanded or intended by violence, as stated expressly in can. 1087. See also can. 214 concerning ordination under compulsion, the impediment of abduction (can. 1074), and acts against faith commanded by idolatrous or heretical parents who may be wicked and powerful enough to compel their children to come with them into non-Catholic temples, etc.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Fear, even though relatively grave, necessity, and even a serious loss or detriment, if merely ecclesiastical laws are violated, often take away responsibility and therefore the guilt of crime.

(a) Fear, or trepidatio mentis ob malum imminens, has been sufficiently explained elsewhere.[37] Since fear does not render a human act purely involuntary, but leaves it substantially free, it is evident that an act done from fear is imputable. Wherefore we need not be surprised that "duress per minas" forms a very rare defence in English-American law.[38]

(b) The same is true of necessity, which is a moral-physical state of man that prompts him to violate the law. Necessity has its degrees which depend on the helplessness of the person that is in need, and on the necessity of having or obtaining what is needed. Therefore extreme, grave, and light necessity are distinguished. Extreme[39] would be the necessity which would concern life or death, material or spiritual. Grave is the necessity which would cause a serious spiritual or material loss of property, name, honor, social condition. Light is the necessity if the loss threatened is of little importance, or if the damage, though great, can easily be warded off or repaired. The Code is very generous, as far as the external forum is concerned, in admitting any kind of necessity, which, as Gratian says,[40] knows no law.

37 See this Commentary, Vol. II, p. 30; Vol. V, p. 245 f.

38 Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 69.

39 Theologians distinguish extrema et quasi-extrema.

40 Dictum ad c. 39, C. 1, q. 1; cfr. c. 5, X, I, 40; c. 2, X, III, 46. Whether gravis, in our text, is also to be referred to necessitas may reasonably be doubted; for the adjective grave is repeated before incommodum, but not before necessitas.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(c) Incommodum means inconvenience, trouble, bother, loss, detriment, and is related to necessity, with this difference, that necessity signifies rather a negative condition, or want, whereas incommodum may involve the positive deprivation of something that is convenient, or becoming, to one's state of life. However, the inconvenience must be great. Incommodum is a very elastic term, and may be referred to the person affected as well as to the object that causes convenience or inconvenience.

(d) Grave fear, necessity, and grave inconvenience excuse from crime only if the violation concerns an ecclesiastical law. For it is generally understood that merely positive laws do not oblige under great inconvenience, inasmuch as the human legislator is supposed not to wish to lay a too heavy burden upon man under such conditions. Thus the law of alienation without papal indult (can. 1532, 2347, n. 3) may really prove too burdensome, nay even detrimental, and therefore does not oblige under certain conditions.

§ 3. On the other hand, § 3 of can. 2205 states that an intrinsically evil act or an act which implies contempt of faith or ecclesiastical authority or injury to souls may be excused on the grounds of grave fear, necessity, and grave inconvenience, but can never be declared entirely immune from criminal imputability.

(a) Ethics teaches that the morality of an act arises from the object, the circumstances, and the end intended by the agent. These determinants make an act either good or bad; and since the moral quality is something objective, the act itself is objectively tainted by the defect of the intrinsic quality of the object, the circumstances or the end. Of course, the intention can be rectified, provided the object and circumstances are either good or indifferent. However, this rather belongs to the internal forum.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(b) To the external forum may be referred three kinds of acts here specified, namely, contempt of faith, contempt of ecclesiastical authority, and spiritual damage. Contempt of faith spells apostasy or heresy, contempt of authority implies schism, if not also heresy, and spiritual damage may be summed up under the heading of co-operation, scandal, and hatred. The synod of Ancyra (314 A. D.) issued three canons concerning the reception of the lapsi, i. e., those fallen in the persecution, to whom clemency is shown, but who are nevertheless censured for the crime they had committed against the faith. Of course, the compulsory offering of incense to pagan idols was free of guilt, but whether the act was done under compulsion could be proved only by the fact that the priests and deacons suffered torments or confiscation and protested their faith.[41]

Spiritual damage would be perjury, which is not allowed under any circumstances.[42]

§ 4. The motive of legitimate self-defence against an unjust aggressor, provided the measure of necessity is not exceeded, takes away the criminal offence, and, like provocation, diminishes imputability. The reason for the clause is that a man may rightfully prefer his own life to that of an unjust assailant, who certainly and actually intends his death, when one or the other must die or will surely be killed. For the unjust assailant forfeits the right of his own life by intending to kill another.

The so-called moderamen inculpatae tutelae requires: (a) that no more force is used than necessary to ward off the attack; (b) that the assailant is hic et nunc in the act

41 See c. 32, Dist. 50.

42 C. 1–3, C. 22, q. 5.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of aggression; (c) that no other means of escape are at hand, and (d) that the intention is (at least implicitly) directed not to the killing, but to the defence.[43]

Whether this plea of self-defence may also be made in cases where one's honor, liberty, or fortune are at stake, is not explicitly stated in our text. However, it is certain that no one would be allowed to kill a calumniator even though the calumny or detraction could not be warded off by any other means. Nor is it allowed to kill a thief for a small amount of money, say one gold ducat, or to kill a man for the sake of a property right to be possessed only in future or by way of inheritance; or to kill one who retains an inheritance, etc.[44]

Provocation and actual aggression not infrequently overlap, and it is difficult to distinguish one from the other.[45] A real challenge often amounts to great danger.

THE PASSIONS

CAN. 2206

Passio, si fuerit voluntarie et deliberate excitata vel nutrita, imputabilitatem potius auget; secus eam minuit plus minusve pro diverso passionis aestu; et omnino tollit, si omnem mentis deliberationem et voluntatis consensum praecedat et impediat.

A passion is a movement or disturbance of the sensible appetite which follows the imagination of good or evil, and has various degrees, from vehemence to mere appre-

43 Hill, l. c., p. 209.

44 Cfr. prop. damn. by the H. O., March 4, 1679, nn. 30–33 (Denzinger, nn. 1047–1055).

45 This certainly was the case in Papiensi, S. C. C., May 18, 1726 (Richter, Trid., p. 93, n. 9), yet a dispensatio ad cautelam was imparted.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

hension. The composite nature of man, i. e., his rational and appetitive constituents, influence morality, the latter not directly, because, being seated in the appetite, they are "blind," but indirectly, inasfar as they are subject to the will. It is evident that passions here are understood, not as consequent, but as antecedent, i. e., as preceding the will and the deliberate action of the will. Consequent passions, i. e., such as follow the free act, cannot affect its free nature, although they may influence other subsequent acts. Antecedent passions sometimes pull in the same direction as the will, sometimes in opposition to it. But no matter in what direction they may pull, freedom of will does not cease entirely, except in rare cases. Yet it is also true that self-control, the characteristic feature of freedom, is lost in proportion as sensible emotion increases. How far it may affect the moral imputability of an act is very difficult to determine, because each individual differs in sensitive or appetitive constitution and the organic or material conditions of temperament and heredity, habits of life, climate and temperature also differ greatly and influence different individuals in greater or less degree.[46] Thus also one individual may have the irascible passions more developed whilst another may be more under the influence of the concupiscible.

This premised, the text says that the passions, when willfully and deliberately excited and fostered, increase imputability; otherwise, i. e., if neither nurtured nor stirred up by wilful coöperation, but simply taken as they objectively affect human nature as a whole and individually, they diminish responsibility in proportion to the degree of strength with which they work on the imagination. Should they precede and impede the deliberation of the mind and the consent of the will, the act following could not be imputed.

46 Cfr. S. Thom., I–II, q. 24; De Veritate, q. 22, art. 9; Hill, l. c., p. 73; Mercier, l. c., II, p. 226.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

AGGRAVATING CIRCUMSTANCES

CAN. 2207

Praeter alia adiuncta aggravantia, delictum augetur:
1.° Pro maiore dignitate personae quae delictum committit, aut quae delicto offenditur;
2.° Ex abusu auctoritatis vel officii ad delictum patrandum.

CAN. 2208

§ 1. Recidivus sensu iuris est qui post condemnationem rursus committit delictum eiusdem generis et in talibus rerum ac praesertim temporis adiunctis ut eiusdem pertinacia in mala voluntate prudenter coniici possit.

§ 2. Qui pluries deliquerit etiam diverso in genere, suam auget culpabilitatem.

Circumstances which enhance a man's responsibility may arise from the quality of the person and his office as well as from a repetition of crimes.

Can. 2207 considers the personal and official circumstances. The higher the dignitary who commits a crime or against whom a crime is committed, the greater the crime itself. For not only is the scandal greater,[47] but the law itself surrounds these persons with greater protection and inflicts severer penalties for crimes commit-

47 Cfr. c. 4, C. 25, q. 1; c. 12, X,II, 24.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ted against them.[48] Consequently clergymen are more severely punished than laymen.[49] A heavier penalty must be meted out to calumniators of the clerical state than to detractors of the lay state.[50] Heresy is more severely punishable in clerics than in laymen.[51]

But authority and office may be abused, and such abuse is the more detestable, the higher the office, and being an abuse of a public trust, also enhances imputability. Hither belongs the acceptance of gifts by ecclesiastical judges;[52] also the crimen falsi, wherefore ecclesiastics who falsify papal or episcopal documents are more guilty than laymen;[53] here also belong the abuse of the confessional[54] and all the crimes mentioned in Title XIX of this book.

Relapse into the same crime also increases culpability. The text first defines a recidivus in the juridical sense. He is one who, after a judicial sentence of condemnation, again commits the same crime under such conditions and circumstances, especially of time (for instance, soon after the sentence) that stubbornness in the practice of evil may be prudently presumed. This may be the case concerning those faults enumerated in can. 2168 ff. (non-residing clergymen) and can. 2176 f. (concerning concubinage with the same or another person). But it must be noted that pertinacia presupposes ill will, i. e., resistance to either paternal or canonical warnings after formal condemnation.

Responsibility or culpability is increased also if one relapses into crimes of a diverse kind. The reason for 48 Can. 2343 f.

49 Can. 2323, 2336, 2340, § 2, 2345 etc.
50 C. 1, X, V, 1.
51 C. 13, X, V, 7.
52 Cfr. can. 1624, 1941, § 2; 2037, § 1.
53 Cfr. can. 2360, 2363; c. 4, C. 25, q. 1.
54 Can. 2367 f.; also can. 1665, § 2; can. 2408.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google this law must be sought in the increased mens rea, just as the virtues united in the one virtue of prudence enhance the good habit.[55] The civil law also takes into consideration whether or not a criminal has been sentenced before.

PARTIES TO A CRIME

CAN. 2209

§ 1. Qui communi delinquendi consilio simul physice concurrunt in delictum, omnes eodem modo rei habentur, nisi adiuncta alicuius culpabilitatem augeant vel minuant.

§ 2. In delicto quod sua natura complicem postulat, unaquaeque pars est eodem modo culpabilis, nisi ex adiunctis aliud appareat.

§ 3. Non solum mandans qui est principalis delicti auctor, sed etiam qui ad delicti consummationem inducunt vel in hanc quoquo modo concurrunt, non minorem, ceteris paribus, imputabilitatem contrahunt, quam ipse delicti exsecutor, si delictum sine eorum opera commissum non fuisset.

§ 4. Si vero eorum concursus facilius tantum reddidit delictum, quod etiam sine eorundem concursu commissum fuisset, minorem imputabilitatem secumfert.

§ 5. Qui suum influxum in delictum patrandum opportuna retractatione abduxerit plene, ab omni imputabilitate liberatur, etiamsi exsecutor delictum ob alias causas sibi proprias nihilominus patraverit; si non abduxerit plene, retractatio minuit, sed non aufert culpabilitatem.

55 Cfr. can. 2234.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

§ 6. Qui in delictum concurrit suum dumtaxat officium negligendo, imputabilitate tenetur proportionata obligationi qua adigebatur ad delictum suo officio impediendum.

§ 7. Delicti patrati laudatio, fructuum participatio, delinquentis occultatio et receptatio aliive actus delictum iam plene absolutum subsequentes, nova delicta constituere possunt, si nempe poena in lege plectantur; sed, nisi cum delinquente de illis actibus ante delictum conventum fuerit, non secumferunt delicti patrati imputabilitatem.

The present canon enumerates various kinds and degrees of participation in criminal acts. The first two sections (§ 1 and § 2) have in view conspirators and accomplices,[56] the following four deal with principals, as they are called in criminal law, who influence others more or less efficaciously, while the last section treats of cooperation after the act. But all kinds fall under the generic name of coöperation, which may be defined as physical concurrence in the evil act of another. However, since the act is supposed to be a criminal one, the distinction between material and formal coöperation is of little value here, because material coöperation presumes the act not to be evil or at least to be indifferent, if such acts exist.

1. Conspirators are those who, by mutual counsel to commit a crime, concur physically or actually in its perpetration. They are equally responsible with the criminal unless de facto circumstances increase or diminish their culpability. Thus in rape or sacrilegious burglary the 56 The difference between conspirators and accomplices may be thus stated: Agreement makes conspirators, crime, accomplices.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

robbers are held equally responsible.[57] Percussores clericorum, if they concur in the same criminal act, are all guilty, even though only one may strike the blow.[58] Conspiracy, of course, being supposed to be entered into by agreement, must be manifested in some way. But if the participants actually share in the criminal act, conspiracy is presumed, and it is incumbent on the participator to prove that he was no partner to the conspiracy. Thus Alexander III decided in the case of Thomas à Becket that all those who had come with the intention of killing or wounding the archbishop, even though they did not lay hands on him, were equally or almost equally guilty with the actual murderers.[59] Hence it is not too much to say that the mere fact of the parties having entered into such an agreement suffices to constitute a conspiracy.[60]

2. Accomplices are partners in a crime which, by its very nature, requires a helper. They are equally responsible with the criminal, unless circumstances lessen, increase or remove imputability. An accomplice is required in simony, which is equally punished in those who give, receive, and consent; religious superiors who simoniacally receive members, and bishops who bless abbots for the same motive are equally guilty.[61] Accomplices are also essential to adultery. However, here the culpability is diminished if one party does not know that the other is married.[62] Another crime which necessarily requires accomplices is duelling.[63] Those who claim ignorance or plead "not guilty" must prove their ignorance or innocence.

57 See cc. 1, 4, C. 36, q. 2: the raptantes, cooperantes, conniventes are subject to the same penalty.

58 C. 34, C. 23, q. 8.

59 C. 6, X, V, 12.

60 Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 272.

61 Cfr. c. 21, C. 12, q. 2; cc. 8, 30, 39, V, 3; can. 2371, 2392.

62 Cfr. c. 5, X, V, 16; can. 2388.

63 Can. 2351.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3. Principals or participators in a crime may take part therein by a more or less efficacious influence, or they may withdraw their coöperation, or they may concur only in a negative way in the perpetration of the crime.

(a) Principals in the first degree are, as per § 3, the (1) mandans or principal author of a crime; (2) the instigators and (3) the aiders and abettors in whatsoever form. All these are no less guilty than the criminal himself, provided the crime would not have been perpetrated without their coöperation and provided all other things are equal. For instance, a prelate ordering celebration of divine office in an interdicted church would be a mandans and both the prelate and the celebrant would incur the same penalty.[64] An instigator (ad delictum inducens) would be a religious inviting outsiders to violate the papal enclosure.[65] The same crime may have abettors or aiders (concurrentes), for instance, in the usurpation or alienation of ecclesiastical property,[66] in procuring abortion and duelling,[67] in forging papal documents, and in the election,[68] presentation or nomination of candidates to ecclesiastical offices.[69] Ceteris paribus means that the guilt may be less in the one or other of the coöperators, because of ignorance of the law, or the greater dignity and official character of the author, instigator or aider.

(b) Principals in a less degree, according to § 4 of can. 2209, are those who aid in the perpetration of a crime, but not so that the crime would not have been committed if they had not concurred, in other words, they are, as it were, merely concomitant perpetrators. These are less responsible, provided, however, they were not acting as

64 Can. 2338, § 3.
65 Can. 2342, n. 1.
66 Can. 2347 f.
67 Can. 2350, § 1; 2351, § 1.
68 Can. 2360.
69 Can. 2394.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google conspirators. Thus, for instance, in the usurpation of ecclesiastical property the main robber may be a high personage and his tools incur less responsibility because the former was bent on carrying out his plans, even though the others would have resisted.

(c) Those who withdraw their coöperation in a crime in a proper and efficacious way are freed from every responsibility, even though the perpetrator commits the crime for reasons of his own; if the withdrawal is only half-hearted, the responsibility is lessened, but not taken away entirely. For instance, in a simoniacal election the money must be entirely refunded and every promise cancelled before election. A druggist who offered medicine for abortion must take it back; if he only dilutes or mixes it with other counteracting ingredients, he is guilty to some extent should abortion result; but he is not guilty at all if the medicine is taken back, and abortion results nevertheless.[70]

(d) Official aiders or abettors in crime are those who neglect their duty and thereby aid in the commission of crimes. Their responsibility is proportionate to the obligation by which they are bound, in virtue of their office, to prevent the crime. For instance, a pastor deserving removal for the reasons mentioned in can. 2182 or in can. 2176, should be removed by the bishop, and if the latter fails to remove him, he himself becomes responsible for the ensuing damage (decrease of Christian training, detriment to divine worship, scandal, etc.). There is now little excuse for not proceeding in such cases, because the law has rendered procedure less diffi-

70 But even in this case a druggist or a physician may be somewhat guilty, if the bottle or box had the formula written on it, because it could be copied before it was returned.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cult and the obligation is incumbent on the Ordinary.[71]

4. Principals or accessories "after the fact" are such as laud and approve a crime, or share in the booty or fruits of the same, or hide and shelter criminals, or abet the crime after it has been perpetrated. Each of these acts constitutes a crime in itself if forbidden under penal sanction; otherwise they exclude imputability, unless conspiracy has preceded.

Can. 2338, § 2, which prohibits intercourse with excommunicati vitandi, affords an example of patrati delicti laudatio or receptatio delinquentis; can. 2338, § 3, would punish the admittentes; can. 2339 concerning ecclesiastical burial affords a similar case, though it appears as an independent crime.

The fructum participantes or detinentes of can. 2345 are here included, because they participate in the theft, provided they are aware of the injustice of the act.[72]

CONSEQUENCES OF CRIMES

CAN. 2210

§ 1. Ex delicto oritur:

1.° Actio poenalis ad poenam declarandam vel infligendam et ad satisfactionem petendam;

2.° Actio civilis ad reparanda damna, si cui delictum damnum intulerit;

§ 2. Utraque actio explicatur ad normam can. 1552–1959; et idem iudex in criminali iudicio potest ad instantiam partis laesae civilem actionem ad examen revocare et definire.

71 There may indeed be some impediments which prompt the Ordinary not to proceed; but there also are purely imaginary obstacles, such as fear of trouble and sheer indolence or ignorance.

72 Cfr. c. 4, X, V, 18.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CAN. 2211

Omnes qui in delictum concurrunt ad normam can. 2209, §§ 1-3 obligatione tenentur in solidum expensas et damna resarciendi quae ex delicto quibuslibet personis obvenerint, licet a iudice pro rata damnati.

The Code calls these things effectus, we prefer to speak of consequences, since effect means the immediate and direct result of an act. These consequences are two: criminal and civil action (can. 2210), which must be proportionately applied to the principals in crime.

From crimes may arise:

1.° A penal or criminal action looking either to a declaration or condemnation to penalty and satisfaction or to retribution;

2.° A civil action looking to a repair of the damage done if any was done.

Both actions have been set forth in can. 1552–1959; but the present text adds that the judge in a criminal trial may, if the injured party demands it, also examine and settle the civil action or damage suit. Thus if damage was done by beating a cleric or by sacrilegious theft, the criminal court may decide the amount of reparation.

Can. 2211 states the obligation of repairing the damage to be imposed on the conspirators, accomplices and instigators, as mentioned under can. 2209, §§ 1–3. This threefold class of participants in a crime are held in solidum to repair the expenses and damage caused by the crime to any and every person who suffered by it. For instance, if two or three persons committed a theft, or three elected a fourth illegally, i. e., simoniacally, to an office, each is held responsible for the whole amount of expenses and damages, just as if he were the only perpetrator, even, says the text, if he were condemned by the judge only to a pro rata payment. Therefore if A was condemned to pay $100, B $150, and C $200, A is liable for $450 in case the other two prove insolvent. Of course A may fall back on B and C by instituting a suit in the civil court, which would certainly recognize the claim of A independently of any criminal action.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE III

CONATUS DELICTI OR INCHOATE CRIMES

CAN. 2212

§ 1. Quicunque actus posuerit vel praetermiserit qui ad exsecutionem delicti natura sua conducunt, sed delictum non consummaverit, sive quia consilium suum deseruit, sive quia delictum propter insufficientiam vel ineptitudinem mediorum perficere non potuit, delicti conatum committit.

§ 2. Cum omnes actus positi vel omissi sunt qui ad exsecutionem delicti natura sua conducunt et ad delictum perficiendum sufficiunt, si ex alia causa, praeter voluntatem agentis, effectum sortiti non sint, delicti conatus dicitur proprio nomine delictum frustratum.

§ 3. Conatui delicti accedit actio illius qui alium ad delictum committendum inducere studuerit, sed inefficaciter.

§ 4. Si conatus delicti peculiari poena in lege mulctetur, verum constituit delictum.

CAN. 2213

§ 1. Delicti conatus suam habet imputabilitatem, eo maiorem, quo magis ad consummationem accedit, quanquam minorem prae delicto consummato, salvo praescripto § 3.

§ 2. Delictum frustratum magis culpabile est, quam simplex delicti conatus.

§ 3. Ab omni imputabilitate liberatur qui sponte ab incepta delicti exsecutione destiterit, si nullum ex conatu damnum aut scandalum ortum sit.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

A conatus delicti is an external act committed with criminal intent, but without effect, in other words, a non-consummated crime. There are allusions to such attempted crimes in the old Corpus Juris Canonici,[1] but the most pronounced example is taken from the Roman law.[2] Our modern civil codes, too, recognize attempted crimes as indictable.[3] The Code distinguishes two species of inchoate crimes: attempted crimes and frustrated crimes. To the former is added the crime of incitement or instigation.

1. A conatus delicti exists whenever one does something which of itself would lead to the perpetration of a crime, but does not consummate the crime itself, either because he gives up the criminal intent, or because the means chosen are insufficient or inadequate to produce the criminal effect. Akin to this criminal attempt is every incitement by which another is induced to commit a crime, but unsuccessfully, because he does not commit the crime to which he is incited. Attempts consist in physical acts which help in a sufficiently "proximate" degree to carry out the contemplated crime. When the act is sufficiently "proximate" cannot be determined by a general rule. Thus, e. g., if a man who contemplated murder or simple percussio clericorum, bought a pistol or other weapon and repaired to the place where he might find his victim, these acts would be too remote. But if,

1 Wernz, l. c., Vol. VI, p. 41; but c. 3, X, V, 25 manifestly treats of provocation and excessive defence.

2 C. 6, Dist. 1 de poenit. = l. 5, Cod. I, 3: "Si quis non dicam rapere, sed attemptare tantum matrimonii iungendi causa sacratissimas virgines ausus fuerit, capitali poena feriatur."

3 Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 72 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

on meeting the victim, he pointed the pistol at him and put his finger to the trigger, or struck out to hit him, there would be a conatus delicti.[4] The same rule may be applied to the procuratio abortus.

2. A crime is said to be frustrated if all the acts necessary for its commission, whether positive or negative, are posited and sufficient preparations are made to commit the crime, but the same is not actually committed because another cause or agent aside from the perpetrator interferes and prevents it. For instance, it was held to be a criminal attempt to kill if one shot through a skylight into the room where he supposed a policeman was watching him, though the policeman had shortly before departed from his position.[5] Thus an assassin may be thwarted by the interference of a third person.

3. If attempts at crime have a determined penalty appointed in law, they constitute separate crimes, as, for instance, attempts to bribe officials and judges are declared to be punishable.[6]

Can. 2213 determines the imputability or responsibility for attempted and frustrated crimes.

1. An attempt to commit a crime is less imputable than the act of perpetrating it; the degree of responsibility for the former must be gauged by its approach to the latter, with due regard, of course, to the damage done.

2. Greater still is the responsibility resulting from a crime that failed involuntarily, or a frustrated crime, than for one resulting from a simple attempt.

3. Those who wilfully desist from perpetrating a crime are free from responsibility for the same, provided no damage and no scandal were caused by the attempted or frustrated crime — which, of course, they would have to repair, according to can. 2211.

4 Ibid. 5 Ibid., p. 74. 6 Can. 2407.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PART II
PENALTIES

SECTION I

PENALTIES IN GENERAL

CAN. 2214

§ 1. Nativum et proprium Ecclesiae ius est, independens a qualibet humana auctoritate, coercendi delinquentes sibi subditos poenis tum spiritualibus tum etiam temporalibus.

§ 2. Prae oculis autem habeatur monitum Conc. Trid., sess. XIII, de ref., cap 1: "Meminerint Episcopi aliique Ordinarii se pastores non percussores esse, atque ita praeesse sibi subditis oportere, ut non in eis dominentur, sed illos tanquam filios et fratres diligant elaborentque ut hortando et monendo ab illicitis deterreant, ne, ubi deliquerint, debitis eos poenis coercere cogantur; quos tamen si quid per humanam fragilitatem peccare contigerit, illa Apostoli est ab eis servanda praeceptio ut illos arguant, obsecrent, increpent in omni bonitate et patientia, cum saepe plus erga corrigendos agat benevolentia quam austeritas, plus exhortatio quam comminatio, plus caritas quam potestas; sin autem ob delicti gravitatem virga opus erit, tunc cum mansuetudine rigor, cum misericordia iudicium, cum lenitate severitas adhibenda est, ut sine asperitate disciplina, populis salutaris ac necessaria,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

conservetur et qui correcti fuerint, emendentur aut, si resipiscere noluerint, ceteri, salubri in eos animadversionis exemplo, a vitiis deterreantur."

This canon vindicates to the Church a right which flows from her very constitution, namely, the right to punish subjects who transgress her laws with spiritual as well as temporal penalties. This right is natural and inherent in the Church, and therefore independent of human authority. It is what we call the coercive or restrictive power, sometimes also styled potestas executiva, although the English term executive does not accurately convey the idea embodied in the Latin word.

The Code uses three adjectives to determine the character of this coercive power:

1. It is called nativum, i. e., an inherent or natural right. The proof for this dogmatic thesis[1] lies in the fact that Christ founded a visible autonomous society endowed with the means to achieve its appointed end.[2] The Church, indeed, is not merely a teaching institution, but a juridical society, the object of which is the common and individual spiritual welfare of men. It is therefore an a priori wrong conception of the Church, if only teaching and preaching penance is emphasized, whilst the binding character of the obligations imposed by membership is neglected. Christ granted power to rule His Church to Peter and the other Apostles, and this power is as wide and deep as the creative word that produced it.[3] There is no limitation or restriction or exception made of the power of binding and loosing. It embraces all things,

1 Trid., sess. 7, can. 14, de baptismo; Martin V, "Inter cunctas," Feb. 22, 1418, art. 31, 33 (Denzinger, n. 575, 577); Pius VI, "Auctorrem fidei," Aug. 28, 1794 propp. 4, 5 (Denzinger, n. 1367 f.); Pius IX, Syllabus, prop. 24 (Denzinger, n. 1572).

2 See Hollweck, l. c., p. IX ff.

3 Cfr. Matth. 16, 19; 28, 18 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

all men who, by the regeneration of Baptism, are incorporated with the visible body of Christ. Neither is this power a merely internal persuasion produced by external exhortation. It means a reality that is sensibly manifested. For those who reject the authority of the Church and refuse to listen to her, are segregated from the body of Christ and must be treated as separated, i. e., as heathen and publicans.[4]

The Apostles commanded as well as preached and were endowed with the power of punishing the disobedient.[5] We cannot imagine that the words addressed to them by Christ are merely strong metaphors inculcating obedience or penance. They rather communicate a power given by One who is the Governor of the universe.

This power of enforcing authority was understood and used by the Church throughout the course of her history. We will only point here to the fact of public penance and the ecclesiastical penalties inflicted on delinquent clerics. All this goes to show that the Church possessed and was conscious of possessing a vindictive power, and consequently it must be admitted that Christ laid down that authority in the constitution of the Church.

2. It is, however, a ius proprium, not merely in the sense of possession, but of a characteristic power. For the coercive power granted to the Church must not be considered as an end, but as a means to an end. Since the purpose of the Church is spiritual, the means, too, must partake of the same nature and therefore be spiritual. We clearly perceive from our Code that the spiritual element prevails. For most of the penalties are censures which directly reflect the spiritual element of the coercive power. In this respect the Church is superior to 4 Matth. 18, 17 f.

5, 4 ff.; II Cor. 8, 8; 10, 5 f.

5 Cfr. Acts 15, 28; I Cor. 4, 21;

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the State, which reaches only the external order of human society. However, this too must be understood in the right way. For we do not say that the Church is limited to merely spiritual means. This would be contrary to the nature of man, who is compounded of body and soul. Besides our text would give us the lie if we were to assume in the Church a merely spiritual (often confounded with internal) power.

3. The legislator further circumscribes this coercive power by the phrase: independens a qualibet humana auctoritate, a power that is independent of every human authority. This is merely a corollary of the nativum ius, for if this power is a constitutional, and therefore divine right of the Church, no human power can destroy or attack it with impunity. We do not read that St. Paul consulted the Proconsul of Achaia before he inflicted on the incestuous a severe punishment which had visible and external consequences. Neither did the Church borrow her power from the emperors. Quite a different thing is the personal immunity of Church dignitaries from the jurisdiction of lay courts. For this privilege may have been brought about and enlarged with the coöperation of the civil power. But the coercive power is not identical or coextensive with personal immunity. The abettors of Louis the Bavarian were dazzled by the imperial power, which they traced to imperial Rome, and therefore asserted that the Church, even as a whole, could not inflict coercive punishment on any man unless the emperor granted her this power. This error was promptly rejected by John XXII, who in this regard acted as the champion of an innate power, not of the papacy alone, but of the Church at large.[6]

6 "Licet," Oct. 23, 1327, art. 5 (Denzinger, n. 427).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

That the Church has been hampered and often unjustly handicapped in exercising this power is apparent from the so-called "appeal from abuses" which the Gallican Liberties asserted as a privilege of the Frankish Church. The Church could not accept such a curtailment of her God-given power. She may tolerate abuses, as she has tolerated persecution, but she can never allow the substantial and necessary powers she has received from her Founder to slip from her.

4. The extent of this coercive power is either formal or material. Formal are the various kinds of punishment, and material are the subjects over whom this power may be wielded (see Title VI).

Here a word may be added concerning the various canonical penalties in general. The text says that these may be either spiritual or temporal. It may be said that this contradicts our statement, made above, that the means of exercising the coercive power must be commensurate with the spiritual purpose of the Church, and therefore spiritual. But we did not forget to say, at the same time, that man is a being who must be treated with human measure in meting out punishments. Now it is a fact, always supposing that the Church is a visible, autonomous society, that men, even clerics, are sometimes more afraid of temporal, sensible punishments than of the spiritual weapon of censures. This all the more where faith has suffered shipwreck or at least has been weakened. Consequently we find even in our Code some fines and detention in houses of correction for clerical offenders. Yet even these penalties clearly have a spiritual aspect: they are inflicted for the purpose of amendment.

The development in the practice of imposing penalties has kept pace with the outward growth and development of the Church and her relation to the State. Excommunication or exclusion from the ecclesiastical body is the oldest penalty; its civil effects are noticeable already in the Apostolic writings.[7] Very severe was the punishment for the relapsed, as the history of the penitential discipline abundantly shows. Reconciliation took place gradually and by way of stations, the gradation of which is a matter of dispute. Clergymen were removed from their office and functions.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

After Catholicism had become the religion of the State, the number of delinquents increased and a varied system of penalties became imperative. Excommunication became twofold, major and minor, to which was later added the personal interdict. Clergymen, too, experienced a variety of penalties, the severity of which varied in different countries. Characteristic of all these penalties was their vindictive nature, as well as the element of atonement or expiation contained in them.[8]

The relation of the Church to the State after the thirteenth century naturally widened the field of penal laws, inasmuch as many crimes which were at first purely ecclesiastical, were now considered civil, and vice versa. Not only ecclesiastical penalties, such as censures, but also temporal penalties were meted out by the ecclesiastical authorities: prison, exile, branding, slavery, loss of civil honor and civil rights, and so forth. The Decretals contribute the last stone to the building of the Church's Penal Code. After this classical period there was a demand — and a most legitimate one — for mitigation.

The inquiring reader may expect an answer to the question whether the ius gladii or right of inflicting capital punishment belongs to the Church as an inherent right.

7 Cfr. I Cor. 5; III Joh. 10; II Thess. III, 14.

8 See Hinschius, l. c., IV, 747 ff.; Eichmann, l. c., p. 7.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

We think not. For to vindicate this right to the Church would entail danger of interference in the right of the State, and besides, the maxim: "Ecclesia non sitit sanguinem" is incompatible with the right of shedding blood. The spirit of the Church is, or at least should be, the spirit of Christ, which spells meekness and mercy. Moreover, one of the purposes of punishment is the correction or amendment of the delinquent. But this purpose is simply frustrated if the criminal is killed.[9] Furthermore, persuasion rather than force is to be used even with regard to the most serious ecclesiastical crimes, heresy and schism, which may be compared to treason in civil law. Yet the Code itself forbids compulsion in matters of faith (can. 1351), according to St. Augustine, who thought it expedient to call for armed resistance only after bloody crimes had been committed by the Donatists. We are aware of the objections that are drawn from the history of the Inquisition,[10] and do not wish to extenuate the stain it has left upon the annals of the Church; but it must be said to the honor of the latter that she always recommended clemency, even when she delivered stubborn recusants up to the secular arm. Besides it must not be forgotten that in the ages of faith heresy was punishable also as treason by the civil government. And finally we must not apply our kidglove notions of criminology and penal law to the ruder Middle Ages.

After this somewhat lengthy digression it remains to explain the term delinquentes. However, this has already been the subject of the first part, for delinquency is related to delictum, and consequently a delinquent means 9 Thus Hollweck, l. c., p. XXVII.

10 The literature on this subject is immense; but we would recommend particularly the popular pamphlet by Eliza Atkins Stone, A Brief for the Spanish Inquisition, reprinted from The Ave Maria.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

one who has committed a crime in the ecclesiastical sense of the word.

§ 2 of can. 2214 recalls the wise admonition of the Council of Trent to the bishops when compelled to use the punitive power. It is essentially the same doctrine as that inculcated by the Apostles [11] and may be divided into three parts:

1. Being pastors, not tyrants, they should first use persuasion and paternal admonition in order to deter men from evil-doing;

2. If some through human frailty have been delinquent, they should be reproved, entreated, and rebuked, but benevolently rather than austerely, by exhortation rather than threats;

3. If, however, the seriousness of the crime requires the rod, gentleness should be combined with firmness, judgment with mercy, and leniency with severity. Thus the faithful shall not be exasperated and wholesome discipline shall be maintained, correction shall lead to amendment, or where malice is combined with stubbornness, the deterring example shall at least be a warning to others.

11 I Tim. IV, 2; I Pet. V, 2.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE IV

DEFINITION, KINDS, INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF PENALTIES

DEFINITION

CAN. 2215

Poena ecclesiastica est privatio alicuius boni ad delinquentis correctionem et delicti punitionem a legitima auctoritate inflicta.

This text is quoted from the Council of Trent. It contains all the elements of penalty as now defined. For an ecclesiastical penalty means the privation of some good, inflicted by the lawful authority for the correction of the delinquent and the punishment of his crime.

Three elements are clearly discernible in this definition: the effect of penalty, its object and source.

1. The effect is privation of some good (privatio alicuius boni). This is the generic feature common to all penalties or pains, for poena means pain or suffering. St. Thomas says that it is essential to pain or penalty that it be an affliction against one's own will for some guilt or crime.[1] Hence man must be made aware of it either in body or mind. Every privation, however, be it in the natural or the supernatural order, causes pain because it is a want of perfection or lack of something that perfects and completes the well-being of man. If the Code

[1] Summa Theol., I–II, q. 46, art 6, ad. 2.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google insists on privation or denial of some good, it is in accordance with modern ideas of criminal law, which emphasize privation rather than positive infliction of pain, thereby excluding the notion of torment or torture. It must be added that even privation should be based on ethical principles. It would be against these rules if those who are entitled to inflict penalties would not observe the limits of justice and morality nor take into consideration the grievousness of the crime committed. An immoral penalty or brutal treatment of criminals [2] is against human nature and invariably misses its purpose.

The bonum of which one may be deprived is determined according to the kind of punishment. If it is a spiritual punishment, supernatural or spiritual goods, such as sacraments and divine worship, are withdrawn; if it is a temporal penalty, natural goods, such as liberty and fortune, are taken away, in whole or in part.

2. The purpose of punishment is twofold, reformatory and punitive. It is notable that the Code emphasizes the reformatory feature first. There is little difficulty among modern criminologists in admitting the reformatory or corrective character of punishment. In fact, there is quite a tendency to proclaim this the sole legitimate object of punishment.[3] But this contention goes too far. There is a wide gulf between Church and State, the latter looking solely to the temporal order of things, whereas the Church considers the whole man, soul and body.

The Code mentions "delicti punitionem." What does that mean? Penalty supposes guilt, and guilt is caused by the breach of an obligation set up either by natural or positive law. Law means order, coördination or sub-

2 The old maxim "reus res sacra," even a criminal is a sacred thing, should guide also the judge and the criminologist.

3 Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 28.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ordination. It is evident that a crime is a breach of law and order, more specifically, a crime against public law, and a discord in human society. And since crime is a defection from public law and order, it naturally follows that human society requires atonement and expiation, not necessarily in the sense of revenge, but as a restoration of the public order by public punishment.[4]

This doctrine may or may not be distasteful to the great majority of modern writers.[5] At the bottom of all criminal law is the sense of public justice outraged by crimes, and the sense of ethical retribution demanding expiation.[6]

Furthermore it cannot be denied that public authority, being the guardian of law and order, must be entitled and obliged to prevent crime. This is the preventive element to be noticed in penalties. Certain reformers would deny that right to the State, but it is obviously implied by the right of self-preservation. "The right to punish must ever remain founded, in part at least, upon the idea of retributive justice. Pain must ever follow wrong-doing. While vengeance is a divine prerogative, human governments are the means and agencies through which divine Providence controls human affairs, and it is, therefore, not only the right but the duty of the State to punish those acts which are deemed subversive of society, quite apart from motives merely prudential or reformatory."[7]

We may, therefore, sum up the purpose of ecclesiastical law as follows: it is reformatory in its main tendency, owing to the nature of the Church as an institution for 4 Lynching, though it cannot be defended, may be understood as growing out of the deep-rooted sentiment of public indignation and as a demand for justice.

5 Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 28, rather incline to the conservative view.

6 Foerster, Schuld und Sühne, 1911, p. 72 f.

7 Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 29.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

saving souls, but it is also expiatory, preventive or deterring, in order to preserve divine and human laws, to keep the public order intact and to show forth the true nature of crime to the guilty as well as to the innocent. A society founded by God cannot dispense with these elements of genuine criminal law.

3. The penalty must be inflicted by lawful authority. For law is not a mere contractual order of things, but a participation in the will of God or divine Providence, and a breach of it therefore requires the intervention of the lawful custodian and guardian of the law. Penalty is neither revenge nor self-affliction, because, as stated above on the authority of St. Thomas, it means affliction against one's own will. Revenge is a private or first right, which, far from restoring the disturbed public order, disturbs it still more. Only the legitimate authority, as the founder of law and the representative of the supreme Ruler, is entitled to demand justice and inflict the necessary penalties on transgressors. Besides, in meting out the penalty, there must be an objective standard for measuring the crime as well as the punishment. The criminal himself or other interested individuals might be either too lenient or too cruel. The golden mean to be observed even in meting out punishment, demands an even balance, which can best be held by the administrators and executors of justice.

DIFFERENT KINDS OF PENALTIES

Can. 2216

In Ecclesia delinquentes plectuntur:

1.° Poenis medicinalibus seu censuris;

2.° Poenis vindicativis;

3.° Remediis poenalibus et poenitentiis.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Can. 2217

§ 1. Poena dicitur:

1.° Determinata, si in ipsa lege vel praecepto taxative statuta sit; indeterminata, si prudenti arbitrio iudicis vel Superioris relicta sit sive praeceptivis sive facultativis verbis;

2.° Latae sententiae, si poena determinata ita sit addita legi vel praecepto ut incurratur ipso facto commissi delicti; ferendae sententiae, si a iudice vel Superiore infligi debeat;

3.° A iure, si poena determinata in ipsa lege statuatur, sive latae sententiae sit sive ferendae; ab homine, si feratur per modum praecepti peculiaris vel per sententiam iudicialem condemnatoriam, etsi in iure statuta; quare poena ferendae sententiae, legi addita, ante sententiam condemnatoriam est a iure tantum, postea a iure simul et ab homine, sed consideratur tanquam ab homine.

§ 2. Poena intelligitur semper ferendae sententiae, nisi expresse dicatur eam esse latae sententiae vel ipso facto seu ipso iure contrahi, vel nisi alia similia verba adhibeantur.

The Code deals with three kinds of penalties: censures or corrective (medicinal) penalties, vindictive penalties, and penal remedies and penances.[8]

1. Censures are called corrective or medicinal penalties because they principally, though not exclusively, aim at amending the delinquent. Consequently, if this purpose is achieved, the penalty is to be removed and the criminal may claim absolution from censure.[9] For, the chief purpose being reformatory, the contumacy or stubbornness is

8 See can. 6, n. 5.

9 Can. 2241, § 1; can. 2248, § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

broken. It also follows that censures are not inflicted for crimes which are mere facta without reference to the future, or, once committed, have no further consequences.[10] But it must also be understood that, although the main object of censures is reformation or correction, yet the purpose of penalty in general, viz.: ethical retribution or reparation, is not excluded. For it is of public interest that each and every crime be duly punished, in order to deter others and thus prevent criminality.[11] The penal character of censures lies in this, that they deprive the delinquent of certain spiritual goods, which may entail temporal consequences, as in the case of an excommunicatus vitandus.

2. Vindictive penalties are intended directly to avenge crimes. Their primary purpose, therefore, is not reformation, but reparation of the violated public order.[12] They may be temporal or spiritual. As far as inflicted on the clergy, they are exhaustively enumerated in can. 2298, whilst vindictive penalties threatened against clergy and laity are mentioned in can. 2291. We need not refer to the former practice which abounded in temporal penalties, as mutilation, decalvatio or scalping, scourging, exile, deportation, galleys, fines, etc.[13] The Code has modified the use of such penalties and limited them to fines and detention in houses of correction.

3. Penal remedies and penances are purely preventive means, though they partake of the penal character, otherwise they would not be enumerated under the heading of penalties. They may indeed also have the purpose of 10 Wernz, l. c., Vol. VI, n. 145, p. 150.

11 C. 35, X, V, 39; c. 1, Clem. I, 9.

12 These penalties may be dispensed, not absolved from, and call for judiciary procedure; can. 1933, § 4; can. 1889, § 2; can. 2207; Eichmann, l. c., p. 54 f.

13 Cfr. Wernz, l. c., n. 99, p. 100 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

mere prevention. For an enumeration see can. 2306 ff.

Penances, even when inflicted in the external forum, differ in character from vindictive penalties, as they generally depend upon acceptance and execution on the part of the penitent and chiefly aim at atonement made to God.[14]

A subdivision of penalties is that based upon the measure and mode of infliction, as per can. 2217.

1. A fixed penalty is one so clearly determined by law or precept, that no room is left for doubting what is meant. Thus, if the law says: "they incur excommunication," "are deprived of office," etc., this and no other penalty must be understood.

Another element must be considered in order to understand the term taxative, which means an accurately defined measure of punishment. An example is that of suspension ex informata conscientia, which must be clearly determined as to effect and time (can. 2188). The term taxative also implies that the circumstances of imputability have been duly weighed, else the judge would have a wide margin left for determining the penalty. This becomes more evident in penalties which are inflicted by a precept, (praecepto). For precept means an order of the judge or superior directly affecting the delinquent and indirectly the crime.[15]

An undetermined or arbitrary[16] penalty is one, the infliction of which is left to the prudent discretion of the judge or superior. The discretion may, however, concern the question whether any penalty is to be meted out at all, 14 Ibid., n. 96, p. 98.

15 Precept differs from verba praeceptiva, because precept means a single order or injunction given under threat of incurring penalty, either ferendae or latae sententiae, whereas verba praeceptiva include the penalties stated in law, and merely state that these penalties must, as a rule, be inflicted, according to can. 2223.

16 See Wernz, VI, n. 61, p. 70.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

or what kind of a penalty, and in what measure. For the law may determine that a penalty must be inflicted, but leave the kind and measure to the judge; e. g., where the phrase is used: "pro gravitate delicti." Take, for instance, can. 2170. It says that the Ordinary must decree privation of income, but may inflict other penalties in addition thereto. Hence the law sometimes prescribes one penalty and intimates others. The law may also establish the minimum of penalties, and leave it to the judge to inflict a severer punishment.[17] Preceptive or obligatory terms in general are: debet puniri, puniendus est, privandus, declarandus or declaretur infamis; facultative or arbitrary terms: pro gravitate culpae, ad arbitrium superioris, etc.

2. A distinction of the ecclesiastical law which has been made a target of attacks against the Church is that between penalties latae and ferendae sententiae. A fixed penalty is latae sententiae if it is attached either by law or precept to the commission of the crime. The law uses, for instance, the terms ipso facto, ipso iure incurrit excommunicationem[18] (can. 2343, privilegium canonis); the superior decrees (per modum praecepti) suspension to be ipso facto incurred for a certain kind of crime: these are penalties latae sententiae. Ferendae sententiae are those which are to be inflicted by the judge or superior, although perhaps appointed by law.[19]

3. A fixed penalty latae sententiae as well as ferendae sententiae may be established by law (a iure). For instance, clerics who violate the privilegium canonis against cardinals and papal legates incur two penalties ipso iure latae sententiae and, besides, are to be deprived of their

17 Cfr. c. 2, X, V, 21; c. 3, X, IV, 3.

18 The Const. "Vacante Sede," for instance, uses the term: innodamus.

19 Cfr. can. 2324, 2328 etc.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

benefices, offices, dignities, which is a penalty ferendae sententiae, although both kinds of penalties are laid down in law (can. 2343).

Ab homine is a penalty which, though established by law, is inflicted by way of a special order per modum praecepti peculiaris, or by a condemnatory judiciary sentence. For instance, the Ordinary may compel recusants to fulfill the terms of a last will, even by censures, because the law (can. 2348) gives him that right. In this case the Ordinary may simply issue a particular order, or, if the case has been brought before the ecclesiastical court, he may issue a sentence of excommunication, or, in the case of a clerical recusant, of suspension. Hence, continues our text, a penalty ferendae sententiae established by law, as in the case of can. 2343, § 2, n. 3, is one a iure tantum as long as no condemnatory sentence has been issued; but after such a sentence has been rendered, it becomes a penalty a iure et ab homine, although considered a penalty inflicted ab homine. The difference is very palpable in can. 2244, § 2 f., and can. 2247, § 2. A condemnatory sentence differs from a declaratory sentence in so far as the latter affects the execution or observance of the penalty as stated under can. 2232.

§ 2 of can. 2217 rules that the penalty must always be understood to be ferendae sententiae, unless ipso iure, or ipso facto, or similar terms are used.[20]

Why can the Church, unlike the State, inflict a penalty latae sententiae? It appears unjust and unworthy of a perfect society to condemn one before he is heard. But we must not forget that the Church is a peculiar society, with a religious character that does not remain on the surface, but penetrates and encompasses the whole man.

20 For instance, can. 2315: habeatur tanquam haereticus, haereticorum poenis obnoxious.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

She reaches into the court of conscience. Besides, the most sacred offices might be neglected and abused without punishment because of lack of witnesses and plaintiffs, and the fear of penalty and final exposure may check malice and carelessness.[21] Therefore the first traces of censures latae sententiae coincide with the spread of evil influences in the sixth and seventh century. In order to protect ecclesiastical discipline more efficaciously, this quasi self-executory remedy was found most efficient and secure.[22] Although the Church has now formally mitigated the practice of inflicting ipso facto penalties by demanding a declaratory sentence in most cases (see can. 2232), it would be against the mind of the legislator to maintain that sentences called ipso facto have no other significance or effect than that of a serious threat.[23]

THE APPLICATION OF PENALTIES

Can. 2218

§ 1. In poenis decernendis servetur aequa proportio cum delicto, habita ratione imputabilitatis, scandali et damni; quare attendi debent non modo obiectum et gravitas legis, sed etiam aetas, scientia, institutio, sexus, conditio, status mentis delinquentis, dignitas personae quae delicto offenditur, aut quae delictum committit, finis intentus, locus et tempus quo delictum commissum est, num ex passionis impetu vel ob gravem metum delinquens egerit, num eum delicti poenituerit eiusdemque malos effectus evitare ipse studuerit, aliaque similia.

21 See Hollweck, l. c., p. xx f.

22 See Hinschius, l. c., IV, 841; V, 85 ff.

23 Prop. 47 damn. by "Auctorem fidei," Aug. 28, 1794 (Denzinger, l. c., n. 1410).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Non solum quae ab omni imputabilitate excusant, sed etiam quae a gravi, excusant pariter a qualibet poena tum latae tum ferendae sententiae etiam in foro externo, si pro foro externo excusatio evincatur.

§ 3. Mutua iniuria compensatur, nisi una pars propter maiorem iniuriae ab eadem illatae gravitatem damnari debet, deminuta, si casus ferat, poena.

1. Penalties must be proportionate to the crime, which is to be judged according to its imputability and the scandal and damage caused. This is the objective standard for the meting out of penalties. It may be noted by the way that the legislator here again takes the public order and public safety as the basis for criminal law.

There is also a subjective proportion, to be taken, not mathematically, as they say, but geometrically, that is to say, not only the objective importance of the law and the objective grievousness of the transgression must be considered in weighing the penalty, but also the circumstances under which, and the end for which the crime was perpetrated. All this has been sufficiently discussed under the title of imputability. Age, knowledge, education, sex, profession (conditio), the mental status of the delinquent, the dignity of the offender as well as of the person offended,[24] the purpose for which the crime was committed must be duly considered as well as the time (e. g., during divine service) and the place (sacred or profane).

Imputability may be lessened or increased according to the degree and cause of passion or fear. The promptness of repentance, efforts made in curbing the evil effects, and similar individual circumstances should also be taken into account.

[24] See, for instance, the gradation in can. 2343.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2. Those circumstances which relieve one from all guilt, as well as those which excuse the perpetrator from grievous sin, also render him immune from every penalty, latae as well as ferendae sententiae, even in the external forum, if he has sufficiently proved his defence in the external forum. The reason for this rule lies in the fact that penalties, especially censures, are grievous and therefore presuppose a grievous fault or crime.[25] The law, being intended chiefly for the upkeep of the external order, supposes such guilt and therefore requires proof of "not guilty," which must be furnished by the accused. Note the term "in foro externo." If the defence is considered valid in foro externo, it is also valid pro foro interno; but not conversely. Compare canon 2251 on censures. Hence the regula juris 23 in 6° : "sine culpa, nisi subsit causa, non est aliquis puniendus," that is, no one should be punished who is without dolus or culpa, unless for a special reason which involves the public welfare.[26]

3. Mutual injury is levelled or compensated, and therefore quashed, provided there is some proportion between the injury done on both sides. There may be an injury of the same nature complained of by two priests. This is looked upon as condoned by mutual calumny. But between a bishop and a priest there is no strict proportion and mutual condonation cannot be supposed ex aequo. It may, however, lessen the penalty, and thus become an extenuating circumstance, when punishment must be dealt out.

25 See c. 41, C. 11, q. 3.

26 Cfr. can. 723; Reiffenstuel, Comment in Reg. Iuris 23.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

INTERPRETATION OF PENALTIES

Can. 2219

§ 1. In poenis benignior est interpretatio facienda.

§ 2. At si dubitetur utrum poena, a Superiore competente inflicta, sit iusta, necne, poena servanda est in utroque foro, excepto casu appellationis in suspensivo.

§ 3. Non licet poenam de persona ad personam vel de casu ad casum producere, quamvis par adsit ratio, imo gravior, salvo tamen praescripto can. 2231.

The general rules of interpretation must also be applied to penal laws. For although the judge may use discretion and "fill up the gaps of the law"— lacunae legis — or mitigate the rigor of the penalty, yet an ecclesiastical judge, being inferior to the Pope, is only a minister and executor of the law, and hence, if the penalty is clearly expressed, and the fact is established, he must apply the penalty according to can. 2223.[27]

1. Rule 49 in Sexto: "In penalties the more favorable interpretation should be adopted," must be understood according to the general rules of interpretation, as stated above. If the penalty is clearly stated in law, it must be applied to the criminal, provided the crime and responsibility for it are ascertained. Therefore the benignior interpretatio concerns only dubious or disjunctive penalties, for instance, if the law uses either — or, and especially if it leaves the measure of punishment to the discretion of the judge.

27 Cfr. C. 11, Dig. 48, 19; Reiffenstuel in Reg. Iuris 49 in 6°; somewhat ambiguous, Wernz, l. c., VI, p. 76, n. 67.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

There is also another rule in 6° (15) which may find a place here: "Odia restringi et favores convenit ampliari." Its interpretation causes difficulty, for a law generally is a restriction and therefore disagreeable, although it may be favorable to another. Thus criminal laws are very hateful to careless citizens and criminally inclined individuals, yet at the same time very beneficial to the commonwealth.[28] It would not do to favor a criminal and provoke a peaceful community. This rule, therefore, must be understood in the light of imputability, damage and scandal. An example may illustrate this. Compare can. 1063, § 2, with can. 2319, § 1, n. 1, where the excommunication latae sententiae, reserved to the Ordinary, is inflicted on those who celebrate a marriage before a non-Catholic minister because scandal is given to the congregation.

2. If there is doubt whether a penalty inflicted by the competent superior is just or unjust, the penalty must be borne in both the internal and external forum, unless an appeal was lodged which has a suspensory effect. The reason for this rule lies in the character of the penal law as a safeguard of the public welfare as well as in the necessity of upholding lawful authority. Therefore an excommunicated person, even though innocent in conscience and justified by public opinion, must conduct himself as guilty.[29]

The meaning of the clause, "excepto casu appellationis in suspensivo" is evident from can. 2243, where censures

28 The laws in favor of religion must, although restrictive of human liberty, be widely interpreted; S. C. P. F., July 2, 1827 (Coll., n. 796). If the law is divisible, i.e., partly favorable and partly unfavorable, the favorable part may be amplified, but the unfavorable must be restricted.

29 Cfr. cc. 1, 31, C. 11, q. 3; see can. 1904. The example of Savonarola is a case in point.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

are declared to have only devolutive recourse attached. Consequently, one who is censured must bear the censure until it is reversed.

3. Analogy is not admitted in interpreting penal laws. Hence there is no stretching from one person to another, no extending from one case to another, even if the reasons or circumstances of persons and cases are quite alike, nay the reasons for extending the penalty seem even stronger. This, of course, depends on the terms which the law uses for persons; for instance, the pronoun qui is of a general tenor, and comprises females as well as males.[30] The term "religious" also comprehends both sexes, unless the context forbids this interpretation.[31] But if the term parochus is used, the penalty threatened must not be extended to other persons, even though they may have some qualities in common with pastors. If the pastor is mentioned, the assistant or curate is not included; if a priest is named, deacons and inferior clerics are excluded.[32] One case is not stretched to cover another because, although circumstances apparently seem to point to sameness, yet each single case has its own peculiar character and circumstances. Thus two pastors may be absent from their homes for the same length of time without the bishop's permission, yet on account of particular circumstances the one may be excused but not the other. Thus also in cases of sollicitatio, where the words used may be understood by one person but not by another. For the interpretation of the penal laws now in force for the whole Church can. 6, n. 5 is to be consulted. In other words, no penalties, temporal or spiritual, corrective or vindictive, are in force at present, except those mentioned in the Code. If these agree

30 Cfr. can. 2350, § 2; can. 2353.
31 Can. 490.
32 Can. 2387; concerning a distinction of persons, see can. 2358.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

verbally and substantially with penalties formerly in vogue, they may be interpreted according to the old forensic practice and theory of authors. If they agree with the old law only in part, the interpretation must be made according to the old practice as far as they agree, but according to the general laws from the wording and context, as far as they disagree.[33]

33 See can. 6, n. 2 and 3; can. 2351 on duelling. Analogy, although forbidden when application is concerned, may be admitted even in penal laws when competency as to application is in question, or if formalities only are concerned; cfr. can. 2296, § 1; 2310; Eichmann, l. c., p. 116, note 2; 124, note 1.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE V

SUPERIORS WHO WIELD COERCIVE POWER

Can. 2220

§ 1. Qui pollent potestate leges ferendi vel praecepta imponendi, possunt quoque legi vel praecepto poenas adnectere; qui iudiciali tantum, possunt solummodo poenas, legitime statutas, ad normam iuris applicare.

§ 2. Vicarius Generalis sine mandato speciali non habet potestatem infligendi poenas.

The rule is that coercive power follows legislative power; for even though we may distinguish sovereignty into the three well-known departments, legislative, judiciary, and coercive, radically and virtually they must be held by one and the same sovereign power, otherwise authority would be divisible, which is absurd.[1] Therefore the Code says that those who enjoy legislative power are authorized to attach a penal sanction to their laws. This is done in order to render laws effective.

But the Code adds to these legislators another class, viz.: those who are entitled to impose precepts. These, too, it says, may attach penalties to their precepts or orders.

There is a notable distinction between precept and law. For a precept may be imposed also in virtue of 1 Montesquieu in his L'Esprit des Lois advocated a complete division, in order to counteract State omnipotence.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

merely domestic power, e. g., a community of religious women may have a precept, which is not law, imposed on them. Furthermore a precept concerns the individual, not territory, and follows the subject everywhere, but ceases to oblige when the authority who has given the precept ceases to exist in whatever manner, unless it was given in writing or in the presence of two witnesses.[2] Taking precept as distinct from law, therefore, it follows that the power of attaching a penal sanction to a precept must be understood of penalties in general, not of censures. Were it otherwise, superioresses of religious congregations would be entitled to inflict censures, which is contrary to ecclesiastical law. On the other hand it would not be exceeding one's power if one endowed with jurisdiction in the external forum would attach a censure to the enforcement of a precept. The general rule, however, is that legislative and coercive power are correlated.

Different from the power of the legislator is that of the judge, as such; he can only administer justice or apply the penal laws already established according to the rules laid down in the Code. We say the judge, as such; for when the Ordinary acts as judge, he may apply the laws, as far as permissible, in proportion to his ordinary power.

The Code first sets forth the coercive power, explaining how far those endowed with this power may extend it; then it lays down rules for judges.

COERCIVE POWERS

Can. 2221

Legislativam habentes potestatem, possunt intra

2 See can. 24; can. 2143.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

limites suae iurisdictionis, non solum legem a se vel a decessoribus latam, sed etiam, ob peculiaria rerum adiuncta, legem tam divinam, quam ecclesiasticam a superiore potestate latam, in territorio vigentem, congrua poena munire aut poenam lege statutam aggravare.

Can. 2222

§ 1. Licet lex nullam sanctionem appositam habeat, legitimus tamen Superior potest illius transgressionem, etiam sine praevia poenae comminatione, aliqua iusta poena punire, si scandalum forte datum aut specialis transgressionis gravitas id ferat; secus reus puniri nequit, nisi prius monitus fuerit cum comminatione poenae latae vel ferendae sententiae in casu transgressionis, et nihilominus legem violaverit.

§ 2. Pariter idem legitimus Superior, licet probabile tantum sit delictum fuisse commissum aut delicti certe commissi poenalis actio praescripta sit, non solum ius, sed etiam officium habet non promovendi clericum de cuius idoneitate non constat, et, ad scandalum evitandum, prohibendi clerico exercitium sacri ministerii aut etiam eundem ab officio, ad normam iuris, amovendi; quae omnia in casu non habent rationem poenae.

1. Those who have legislative power may attach penal sanctions to their laws within the limits of their jurisdiction. Hence

a) The Pope has coercive power over and in the whole Church, and may abrogate, modify, and circumscribe penal laws.

b) Ordinaries and those who go by that name may do the same as far as their territory or subjects or powers

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google reach. But their power is limited by the common law and must be interpreted acording to the rules laid down in the following canons.

c) Metropolitans enjoy coercive power in the dioceses of their suffragans only as far as can. 274, n. 5 admits.

d) The Vicar-General, according to can. 2220, § 2, requires a special commission from his Ordinary to inflict penalties.

e) Religious superiors of exempt clerical communities enjoy coercive power within the limits of the common law and their own constitutions. But their subjects, i. e., regulars, are liable to be punished by the local Ordinaries in certain cases.[3]

f) Religious superiors who enjoy only domestic power, i. e., no jurisdiction proper in foro externo, may indeed attach penalties to the enforcement of their precepts as far as the domestic power permits;[4] but they must abstain from inflicting censures or any other penalty that would savor of abuse of jurisdiction in foro externo. Neither can pastors or simple priests as such inflict censures.[5]

2. Those who have real legislative (not preceptive) power, that is, all except those mentioned above under f, are permitted by can. 2221:

a) To add a penal sanction to their own law or to any law issued by their predecessor which was a lex minus quam perfecta, i. e., lacking a penal sanction;

b) To add to or to increase a penal sanction already attached by law to a divine or an ecclesiastical law issued by a superior lawgiver for that respective territory, if special circumstances demand such an addition or increase

3 Cfr. can. 616, § 2;; 619; 631; 1425, § 2; 2269, § 2.

4 Cfr. can. 501, § 1.

5 S. C. P. F., May 5, 1654 (Coll., n. 120); some missionaries seem to have claimed this power.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of penalty. Thus a general prohibition had been issued for the Christians of the Malabaric Rite not to play any kind of musical instruments for the purpose of idol worship. This was placed under excommunication and enforced with great rigor.[6]

Ordinaries may also use rigor in order to eradicate certain local or provincial vices, as stated under can. 897.

However, it should be noted that the canon just quoted, which treats of reservation, supposes that the crimes are atrocious, not merely conventional. An atrocious crime would be robbery, incendiarism, or keeping children away from religious instruction or sending them without necessity to non-Catholic schools, where Catholic schools are available.[7]

3. Can. 2222 instructs superiors how to proceed when inflicting a penalty for the transgression of laws which have no penal sanction attached (leges minus quam perfectae). Thus canon 140 forbids a cleric to attend theatres or balls. There is no penalty provided against the transgressors of this canon. Yet the Ordinary could mete out a just punishment. Therefore § 1 of can. 2222 distinguishes thus:

a) The general rule is that no penalty is to be inflicted without a threat or canonical warning. This warning must contain a penalty of either ferendae or latae sententiae before the transgression happens. Only in case the transgression is proved does the penal sanction go into effect. Thus, in the case mentioned, the Ordinary would have to forbid theatre-going under penalty of either ferendae or latae sententiae, otherwise the delinquent could not be punished.

6 Benedict XIV, "Omnium sollicitudinum, Sept. 12, 1744, § 14, dub. XIII (Coll. P. F., n. 347).

7 See can. 1372–1374; can. 2319, § 1, n. 4.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

b) The first clause states an exception to this general rule: the lawful superior may inflict a just penalty even without previous canonical warning or threat of punishment, if scandal has been given or the transgression is of a particularly serious character. This may happen if the theatre is one of the lower type and perhaps offensive also to religion. For the rest, we refer to what was said on suspension ex informata conscientia, which the lawgiver undoubtedly had in mind.[8]

§ 2 of can. 2222 grants the lawful superior preventive power and also obliges him to make use of this power in case of a probable crime and of a crime against which criminal action cannot be brought on account of prescription.[9] But this canon concerns only clergymen. Therefore in either of these two cases, viz., of a probable[10] crime or a crime for which a penalty is prescribed, the lawful superior (also of exempt religious),

1.° May and should not promote to either minor or major orders a cleric of whose unfitness he is certain;

2.° He may and should prohibit such a cleric from exercising the sacred ministry, in order to avoid scandal;

3.° He may and should, to avoid scandal, remove such a cleric from office according to the rules laid down in can. 2147–2161.

But this preventive suspension has not the character of an ecclesiastical penalty, and consequently its transgression does not induce irregularity (cfr. can. 985, n. 7).

8 See can. 2186–2194; Vol. VII, p. 471 ff.

9 See can. 1704, § 2; Vol. VII, 147 f.

10 A probable crime may be called one which cannot be fully proved, yet is testified to by at least one trustworthy witness or known to the superior extra-sacramentaliter.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

THE JUDGE

Can. 2223

§ 1. In poenis applicandis iudex nequit poenam determinatam augere, nisi extraordinaria adiuncta aggravantia id exigant.

§ 2. Si lex in statuenda poena ferendae sententiae facultativis verbis utatur, committitur prudentiae et conscientiae iudicis eam infligere, vel, si poena fuerit determinata, temperare.

§ 3. Si vero lex utatur verbis praeceptivis, ordinarie poena infligenda est; sed conscientiae et prudentiae iudicis vel Superioris committitur:

1.° Poenae applicationem ad tempus magis opportunum differre, si ex praepropera rei punitione maiora mala eventura praevideantur;

2.° A poena infligenda abstinere, si reus perfecte fuerit emendatus, et scandalum reparaverit, aut sufficienter punitus sit vel puniendus praevideatur poenis auctoritate civili sancitis;

3.° Poenam determinatam temperare vel loco ipsius aliquod remedium poenale adhibere aut aliquam poenitentiam iniungere, si detur circumstantia imputabilitatem notabiliter minuens, vel habeatur quidem rei emendatio aut inflicta a civili auctoritate castigatio, sed iudex vel Superior opportunam praeterea ducat mitiorem aliquam punitionem.

§ 4.° Poenam latae sententiae declarare generatim committitur prudentiae Superioris; sed sive ad instantiam partis cuius interest, sive bono communi ita exigente, sententia declaratoria dari debet.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Can. 2224

§ 1. Ordinarie tot poenae quot delicta.

§ 2. Si tamen propter numerum delictorum nimius esset poenarum infligendarum cumulus, prudenti iudicis arbitrio relinquitur aut poenam omnium graviorem infligere, addita, si res ferat, aliqua poenitentia vel remedio poenali, aut poenas intra aequos terminos moderari, habita ratione numeri et gravitatis delictorum.

§ 3. Si poena constituta sit tum in conatum delicti tum in delictum consummatum, hoc admisso, infligi tantum debet poena in consummatum delictum statuta.

Can. 2225

Si poena declaretur vel infligatur per sententiam iudicialem, serventur canonum praescripta circa sententiae iudicialis pronuntiationem; si vero poena latae vel ferendae sententiae inflicta sit ad modum praecepti particularis, scripto aut coram duobus testibus ordinarie declaretur vel irrogetur, indicatis poenae causis, salvo praescripto can. 2193.

The judge, as such, is the minister of justice and executor of the coercive power. He is bound by, and not above, the law,[11] and consequently must be guided by the text of the law, carefully weigh the number and nature of the crime, whether fully perpetrated or only attempted, and, finally, observe the rules of procedure.

1. He must consider the law, and, therefore:

a) Is not allowed to increase a fixed penalty, unless extraordinary circumstances demand a severer punishment,

11 C. 2, X, I, 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

e. g., the atrocity of a crime, the scandal given, etc. The increase may consist of multiplication or added intensity, for instance, suspension and detention in a house of correction, or suspension from office and benefice, etc.[12]

b) If the penal law ferendae sententiae is couched in arbitrary terms (verbis facultativis), it is left to the conscience and prudence of the judge to mete out the penalty or dictate the minimum penalty if this is fixed.[13]

c) If the wording of the penal law is compulsory (verbis praeceptis), the penalty must, as a rule, be inflicted. There is a precept in terms used in the subjunctive or gerundive forms: privetur, privandi sunt, debet puniri, suspendi, removeri, etc. Yet even in this case the legislator leaves it to the conscience and prudence of the judge, both of which qualities suppose that he decides objectively, not subjectively or under the influence of passion.

α) He may delay the application of the penalty to a more opportune time if he foresees greater evils from premature or hurried punishment. This depends on circumstances of time and person.[14]

β) He may abstain from inflicting the penalty if the delinquent shows that he has thoroughly reformed and repaired the scandal given, or has undergone or will probably undergo a proportionate punishment at the hands of the civil authority. This, of course, supposes a so-called mixed crime, which the civil as well as the ecclesiastical authorities provide for in their penal codes.

γ) He may mitigate a fixed penalty or substitute for it either a penal remedy or some penance.[15] Thus he may inflict partial instead of total suspension, instead of a fine

12 Cfr. can. 2324, 2337 etc.

13 Cfr. can. 2405, 2406, § 2.

14 In countries where Church and State are separate, interference from the latter should not easily occur; still popular commotion may bring it about; see can. 2337.

15 Of these see can. 2306 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

he may decree alms, etc. But this mitigation supposes that a notably alleviating circumstance speaks in favor of lesser imputability on the part of the delinquent, or that he has given proof of amendment, or that a civil punishment has already been inflicted, and the ecclesiastical judge nevertheless deems it opportune to mete out a mitigated punishment. This action is justified because the ecclesiastical judge thereby emphasizes the fact that the Church has the right to exercise coercive power and to show her abhorrence of public crimes.

d) As a rule it is left to the discretion of the superior to declare that a penance has been incurred, i.e., to issue a declaratory sentence. However, this sentence must be issued if the interested party insists, for instance, on getting satisfaction or removing suspicion, or if the public welfare demands it, for instance, in the case of a corruptor, or briber, or dangerous heretic.

2. The judge must furthermore, under can. 2224, consider the number of crimes committed. As a rule each crime demands its separate penalty. However, if the numer of crimes would call for too great a number of penalties, the judge should use prudent judgment. He may, therefore, inflict the heaviest penalty and, if circumstances demand it, add some penances or penitential remedies. He may, also, after having weighed the number and gravity of the crimes committed, mitigate the penalties according to the rules of equity. If an inchoate and a consummated crime have distinct penalties in law, the judge shall inflict only the penalty established for the consummated crime if this had been committed.

3. Finally, the judge must observe the rules of procedure according to can. 2225, as follows:

a) If a penalty is declared or inflicted by way of a

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:57 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google judiciary sentence which presupposes at least a summary trial, he must observe the rules laid down in can. 1968 ff.

b) If a penalty, more especially a censure, either latae or ferendae sententiae, is to be inflicted by way of a particular order or precept, it must be declared to have been incurred (latae sententiae), or actually inflicted, in writing or before two witnesses, and the reasons for it given. The text says ordinarie, as a rule, because the suspensio ex informata conscientia (see can. 2193) does not require that the reasons be indicated.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE VI

WHO ARE LIABLE TO THE COERCIVE POWER OF THE CHURCH

The Code first determines the obligatory force of penal laws, as such (and the exceptions, can. 2227); then it fixes responsibility for the crime, psychologic conditions and partnership, the moment for incurring the penalty and its actual infliction, and, finally, it deals with plural and inchoate crimes.

GENERAL RULES AND EXCEPTIONS

CAN. 2226

§ 1. Poenae adnexae legi aut praecepto obnoxius est qui lege aut praecepto tenetur, nisi expresse eximatur.

§ 2. Licet lex poenalis posterior abroget anteriori, si tamen delictum, quando lex posterior lata est, iam commissum erat, applicanda est lex reo favorabilior.

§ 3. Quod si lex posterior tollat legem vel poenam tantum, haec statim cessat, nisi agatur de censuris iam contractis.

§ 4. Poena reum ubique terrarum tenet, etiam resoluto iure Superioris, nisi aliud expresse caveatur.

CAN. 2227

§ 1. Poena nonnisi a Romano Pontifice infligi aut declarari potest in eos de quibus in can 1557, § 1.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Nisi expresse nominentur, S. R. E. Cardinales sub lege poenali non comprehenduntur, nec Episcopi sub poenis latae sententiae suspensionis et interdicti.

1. The general rule is that those who are subject to laws or precepts are also subject to the penal sanctions attached thereto, unless they are expressly exempted. Hence

a) The lawgiver himself is not subject to purely ecclesiastical penalties by compulsion (vi coactiva), though morally speaking, or from a sense of propriety (vi directiva), he may be said to be subject to them. Practically it is better to say that he is not subject to his own penal laws.

b) Rulers of nations and their offspring and successors are immediately subject to the Roman Pontiff, who alone can issue a condemnatory or declaratory sentence against them (can. 2227, § 1).

c) Cardinals are immune from penal laws, unless they are expressly mentioned as subject to them. Thus in the Constitution of Pius X, "Vacante Sede," (e. g., n. 51) they are threatened with excommunication latae sententiae if they reveal the proceedings of a papal conclave. They are also mentioned in can. 2397, concerning the oath they have to take.

d) Bishops, also titulars, are not subject to the penalties latae sententiae of suspension and interdict, unless they are expressly mentioned, as in can. 2370 and also in can. 2373. Although the name "bishop" does not occur in the latter canon, it certainly applies to Ordinaries. Other penalties, like excommunication and privation of income (can. 2398) they may also incur.

e) Exempt religious are subject to the penalties established by common law, and as far as the common law subjects them to the coercive power of the local Ordinary.[1] Religious who do not enjoy the privilege of exemption, are subject to the penal laws of the Code and also to those established by the particular laws of their territory, unless their approved Constitutions modify, restrict, or enlarge the power of the local Ordinary over them.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

f) As to peregrini and vagi, see can. 14.

2. Sections 2 and 3 of can. 2226 establish the relation of a later to a former penal law and to the consequence. A later law abrogates a former one, but a crime committed before the later law was passed is punishable according to that one which is more favorable to the delinquent. Thus, for instance, can. 2319, § 1, n. 1, is more favorable than the old law to those who have contracted mixed marriages before a non-Catholic minister; for the Ordinary may absolve them, even though they have contracted the marriage before the Code went into effect (May 18, 1918).[2]

If the later law abolishes the former entirely, or only as to its penal sanction, the penalty ceases immediately and the delinquent is therefore immune from punishment, no matter whether he has not yet been punished or has undergone part of the punishment. On the privation of active and passive vote or of office, e. g., in alienation, see can. 2347. An exception to this last named rule (§ 3) are censures, which remain if contracted by reason of a former law now abolished (can. 2248, § 1).

3. An ecclesiastical penalty binds the delinquent everywhere, even after the superior who inflicted it has gone out of office. This applies to penal laws in general, for

1 See can. 616 f.; 1425, § 2. Concerning the interdict, a probable opinion formerly exempted regulars from incurring the same, if clerus only is mentioned; Hollweck, l. c., p. 132; however, see 2269, § 2.

2 Formerly they were suspected of heresy, according to "Apostolicae Sedis," n. 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

there are, e. g., local interdicts which are merely territorial (see can. 2247, § 2). A priest suspended by his bishop from saying Mass cannot say Mass in another diocese, "unless the penalty contains a clause to the contrary." Thus it may be that the bishop suspends one from saying Mass in his diocese [3] only because of scandal given there. The reason for this law lies in the fact that the coercive power emanates from the supreme lawgiver, who holds the keys of the whole Church and watches over the unity and uniformity of ecclesiastical discipline. The Orientals, however, are not subject to the ecclesiastical penalties established in the Code (Can. 1.).

THE CRIMINAL ACT

CAN. 2228

Poena lege statuta non incurritur, nisi delictum fuerit in suo genere perfectum secundum proprietatem verborum legis.

Since every penalty supposes a crime, it is evident that no penalty established by law can be incurred, unless the crime defined in the law has been fully committed. Hence a diagnosis must precede. For instance, if one is accused of simony in conferring or obtaining an ecclesiastical office, it must be proved that a bribe or price was offered and accepted, or that an unlawful contract was made.[4] If women violate the enclosure of men's convents, the fact of violation must be established; if the limits of 3 Whether the suspension ex informata conscientia ceases with the bishop's departure from office is not expressly stated in the Code (can. 2188; thus Eichmann, l. c., p. 67), but implied by the warning that the penalty should be temporary only.

4 Cfr. c. 4, X, V, 3; can. 2392.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

enclosure are not clearly indicated, there can be no breach of enclosure. [5]

The means for proving criminal acts are pointed out in can. 1747–1836. Experts and ocular inspection have a place here.

PSYCHOLOGICAL AND PHYSIOLOGICAL REQUISITES OF CRIME AND CRIMINAL COÖPERATION

CAN. 2229

§ 1. A nullis latae sententiae poenis ignorantia affectata sive legis sive solius poenae excusat, licet lex verba de quibus in § 2 contineat.

§ 2. Si lex habeat verba: praesumpserit, ausus fuerit, scienter, studiose, temerarie, consulto egerit aliave similia quae plenam cognitionem ac deliberationem exigunt, quaelibet imputabilitatis imminutio sive ex parte intellectus sive ex parte voluntatis eximit a poenis latae sententiae.

§ 3. Si lex verba illa non habeat:

1.° Ignorantia legis aut etiam solius poenae, si fuerit crassa vel supina, a nulla poena latae sententiae eximit: si non fuerit crassa vel supina, excusat a medicinalibus, non autem a vindicativis latae sententiae poenis;

2.° Ebrietas, omissio debitae diligentiae, mentis debilitas, impetus passionis, si, non obstante imputabilitatis deminutione, actio sit adhuc graviter culpabilis, a poenis latae sententiae non excusant;

3.° Metus gravis, si delictum vergat in contemptum fidei aut ecclesiasticae auctoritatis vel in publicum animarum damnum, a poenis latae sententiae nullatenus eximit.

[5] See can. 2342, n. 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 4. Licet reus censuris latae sententiae ad normam § 3, n. 1 non teneatur, id tamen non impedit quominus, si res ferat, congrua alia poena vel poenitentia affici queat.

CAN. 2230

Impuberes excusantur a poenis latae sententiae, et potius punitionibus educativis, quam censuris aliisve poenis gravioribus vindicativis corrigantur; puberes vero qui eos ad legem violandam induxerint vel cum eis in delictum concurrerint ad normam can. 2209, §§ 1–3, ipsi quidem poenam lege statutam incurrunt.

CAN. 2231

Si plures ad delictum perpetrandum concurrerint, licet unus tantum in lege nominetur, ii quoque de quibus in can. 2209, §§ 1–3, tenentur, nisi lex aliud expresse caverit, eadem poena; ceteri vero non item, sed alia iusta poena pro prudenti Superioris arbitrio puniendi sunt, nisi lex peculiarem poenam in ipsos constituat.

In can. 2202 the Code referred to ignorance as taking away or diminishing imputability. This is the mental or psychologic element which must be considered also in meting out penalties. Besides ignorance, there are other mental conditions, either transient or habitual, which may influence the superior or judge in inflicting penalties. These are mentioned in can. 2229 sqq. The general rule is that the penalty must be proportioned to the responsibility of the criminal.

1. Affected ignorance (ignorantia affectata), i. e., the kind that is purposely fostered in order to avoid the trouble of finding out the law and to have a pretext for transgressing it, does not render one immune from incurring the penalties latae sententiae, no matter whether this ignorance concerns the law itself or its penal sanction,—not even if the law contains words like these: praesumpserit, ausus fuerit, scienter, studiose, temerarie, consulto egerit, i. e., even though the law expressly demands a dolus. The reason is evident. For such ignorance is culpable and arises from a dolus, the degree of which is therefore not only diminished but increased. A cleric, therefore, who would purposely abstain from reading the penal Code or from informing himself of its provisions, could hardly be excused from dolus, and the penalties latae sententiae could be declared against him.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2. If the law contains the terms quoted above: praesumpserit, etc., or similar ones which require full knowledge and deliberation, every degree of diminished imputability, either of the intellect or the will, renders the offender with such lessened responsibility immune from penalties latae sententiae; not so much because of the objective verification of the criminal act, as on account of his subjective state of mind. For instance, one who knowingly reads a book forbidden in virtue of can. 2318, § 1, incurs excommunication especially reserved to the Apostolic See, but if he did not know that it was a heretical book, or one forbidden by Apostolic letter, he does not incur excommunication.

3. If the law does not contain the terms praesumpserit, ausus fuerit, etc.:

a) Crass or supine ignorance (crassa vel supina ignorantia) exempts from no penalty latae sententiae. This ignorance supposes, not so much a positive as a negative

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

attitude towards the law; hence crassa vel supina ignorantia is imputed to one who takes little or no trouble to find out the truth. Such ignorance, of course, is imputable in proportion to the obligation one is under to acquire the knowledge in question. Less imputable is the ignorance called purely vincible, for it supposes that one has at least made an effort, even though insufficient, to overcome one's ignorance. Such ignorance (here called "non crassa vel supina") excuses from censures (a medicinalibus), but not from vindictive penalties latae sententiae. The reason for this difference must be sought in the intensiveness of the corrective penalties and their more individual character, whereas the vindictive penalties are intended more or less for the public weal and order, just as irregularities, the ignorance of which does not excuse from incurring them, concern the clerical decorum in directo and the person in obliquo.

b) Drunkenness, carelessness, mental weakness, impetuous passions do not exempt from penalties latae sententiae, provided the responsibility, though somewhat diminished, is still grievously culpable; thus procuratio abortus (can. 2350), though committed in the heat of passion, would still be subject to excommunication.

c) Grave fear by no means excuses from penalties latae sententiae, if the crime involves contempt of faith or of ecclesiastical authority, or public damage to souls. Hence no one is excused from the penalty laid down in can. 2314, § 1 (apostasy from faith), nor from that established in can. 2335, which forbids membership in Masonic societies which conspire against ecclesiastical and civil authority. The public welfare is jeopardized by the violation of the seal of confession (can. 2369).

§ 4, lastly, rules that a delinquent who, on account of purely vincible ignorance, does not incur censures, may

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

nevertheless be punished, if expedient, by some penalty or penance. This, of course, should be guaged according to the publicity, scandal, and damage incurred.

Can. 2230 considers, first, impuberes as such, and then as instruments of puberes, whilst can. 2331 properly defines partnership in crime.

1. Impuberes, i. e., boys before the fourteenth and girls before the twelfth year of age, completed, are excused from penalties latae sententiae, and should be punished rather by reformatory educational means than by censures and severe vindictive penalties. To the point is can. 2342, n. 2, concerning the breach of enclosure in men's convents. There women are named, but girls (impuberes) do not incur the excommunication, whereas religious superiors and others who admit a girl under age incur it.[6] The difference is palpable.

2. Therefore puberes who induce impuberes to violate a law or who are partners to a crime, according to can. 2209, §§ 1–2, incur the legal penalty, though the impuberes who are coaxed into, or coöperate in, the crime are free from any penalty latae sententiae. This difference is based upon responsibility, and the age limit must here be taken mathematically; because this is the more benign interpretation and more secure in the application. The maxim "malitia supplet aetatem" should not be applied here.

3. In cases of partnership in crime can. 2209, §§ 1–3 must be consulted as to the responsibility of the parties. Those who concur in a crime by conspiracy, or as accomplices or effective counsellors and coöperators, are subject to the same penalty, though only one (in the singular) is mentioned in the penal law; unless the text has a contrary provision.[7] Others mentioned under can. 2209 are to be punished proportionately, according to the prudent discretion of the superior, unless the law provides a special penalty.

[6] Yet there is a controversy concerning the point, as shall be seen under said canon.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

WHEN PENALTIES TAKE EFFECT

CAN. 2232

§ 1. Poena latae sententiae, sive medicinalis sive vindicativa, delinquentem, qui delicti sibi sit conscius, ipso facto in utroque foro tenet; ante sententiam tamen declaratoriam a poena observanda delinquens excusatur quoties eam servare sine infamia nequit, et in foro externo ab eo eiusdem poenae observantiam exigere nemo potest, nisi delictum sit notorium, firmo praescripto can. 2223, § 4.

§ 2. Sententia declaratoria poenam ad momentum commissi delicti retrotrahit.

CAN. 2233

§ 1. Nulla poena infligi potest, nisi certo constet delictum commissum fuisse et non esse legitime praescriptum.

§ 2. Licet id legitime constet, si agatur de infligenda censura, reus reprehendatur ac moneatur ut a contumacia recedat ad normam can. 2242, § 3, dato, si prudenti eiusdem iudicis vel Superioris arbitrio casus id ferat, congruo ad resipiscentiam tempore; contumacia persistente, censura infligi potest.

1. A penalty latae sententiae, whether corrective or vindictive, binds the delinquent ipso facto both in the ex-

7 Conspirators, can. 2331, § 2; can. 2342, nn. 1, 2; 2351; cooperators, can. 2347; accomplices, can. 2338, § 2; can. 2362, 2371, etc.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ternal and in the internal forum, provided he is conscious of the crime. For instance, a bishop-elect who neglects to receive episcopal consecration within the time prescribed, is bound in conscience and publicly to apply to himself the penalty stated in can. 2398.

However, says the text, if defamation should actually follow the application of this penalty, the delinquent is excused from executing the penalty as long as no declaratory sentence has been issued. This clause does not state in what forum, whether the external or the internal, the delinquent is excused. The word infamia seems to point to the external forum, because the penitential forum appears, to us at least, not to entail defamation. Therefore we should say that in the internal forum the penalty must be observed if it can be done without the loss of good name and if the penalty is divisible.[8] Thus in the example taken from can. 2398, the bishop-elect might apply the forfeited income to charitable purposes without great risk of defamation. The second clause of can. 2398 could hardly be observed without defamation.

The text continues: and in the external forum no one is allowed to demand this self-execution of the penalty on the part of the delinquent, unless the crime is notorious, with due regard, however, to can. 2223, §4, which leaves the issuance of a declaratory sentence to the discretion of the superior and demands it only when the parties insist or when public welfare is at stake. Thus a priest may be interested in the declaration of a sentence against another because of the title he has to a parish.

A declaratory sentence does not constitute a penalty, but simply affirms that a penalty has been incurred, and hence throws the penalty back to the moment when the [8] Wernz, l. c., VI, n. 63, p. 74.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

crime was committed. The consequence is plain, especially with regard to fines, which run from the moment when the crime was committed.[9]

2. No penalty can be inflicted unless it is certain that the crime has been perpetrated and legitimate prescription has not set in, according to can. 1703–1705. Besides, although these conditions may be verified, no censure should be inflicted (censura ferendae sententiae) except after rebuke and warning have been administered to the delinquent. To that purpose also a certain term should be granted, according to the prudent discretion of the judge or superior, and only if contumacy is persisted in, should the censure be inflicted.

It may be well to add that theory at least permits one who is accused and condemned to a manifestly unjust sentence, not to heed the sentence, at least in the internal forum.[10]

MULTIPLIED AND ATTEMPTED CRIMES

Can. 2234

Qui plura delicta commisit, non modo gravius puniri, sed si, prudenti iudicis arbitrio, res id ferat, subiici etiam vigilantiae vel alii remedio poenali.

Can. 2235

Delictum frustratum aut conatus delicti, nisi tanquam distincta delicta lege plectantur, possunt con-

9 As to the effects of excommunication and suspension, see can. 2261, 2264, 2284.

10 As to the external forum, see can. 2219; many authors permit the manifestly innocent to shirk the penal consequences if no scandal or contempt of authority is to be feared; Eichmann, l. c., p. 68.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

grua poena pro gravitate puniri, salvo praescripto can. 2213, §3.

Those who have committed several crimes, either of the same kind, or of different kinds, should not only be more severely punished, but also subjected to vigilance and other penal remedies. A frustrated or attempted crime may be punished proportionately to the actual crime, unless the attempt itself is punishable in law as a distinct crime (see can. 2213, §3.)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE VII

REMISSION OF PENALTIES

The Code certainly takes poenarum remissio for the authoritative removal of penalties. For by committing a crime one has incurred the bond of guilt (vinculum culpae), which in turn introduces another bond, viz., that of penalty (vinculum poenae.) This juridical bond, established by the coercive power, can be solved only by the same authority. The Code does not take into consideration the cessation of penalties by the death of the delinquent and by atonement. Death dissolves everything, but not the effect of censures. Atonement extinguishes penalties, inasmuch as it has the character of a temporarily fixed penalty.[1] Thus the fasts and pilgrimages of the penitential discipline may be looked upon as temporary punishments, which cease after the lapse of time for which they were decreed. But the Code does consider prescription, by which the criminal action may be quashed (can. 2240; see can. 1703).

WHO MAY GRANT PARDON

Can. 2236

§ 1. Remissio poenae sive per absolutionem, si agatur de censuris, sive per dispensationem, si de poenis vindicativis, concedi tantum potest ab eo qui poenam tulit, vel ab eius competente Superiore aut successore, vel ab eo cui haec potestas commissa est.

1 Wernz, l. c., VI, n. 82 f., p. 90 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2. Qui potest a lege eximere, potest quoque poenam legi adnexam remittere.

§ 3. Iudex qui ex officio applicat poenam a Superiore constitutam, eam semel applicatam remittere nequit.

§ 1. Penalties may be removed by way of absolution or dispensation. The former is applied to censure, the latter to vindictive penalties. But both presupposes jurisdiction over the person as well as over the matter at issue, because of the juridical tie contracted by penalty.

Therefore only he can absolve or dispense who has established or inflicted the penal law or penalty. Only, the Pope can absolve or dispense from all penalties, even without the valid reason [2] otherwise required for dispensations and absolutions imparted by prelates inferior to the Sovereign Pontiff. A sufficient reason is the amendment and the reparation of damage or scandal.

Ordinaries may dispense or absolve from penalties which they themselves, not the common law, have established or inflicted.[3]

The successors of these ecclesiastical authorities are endowed with the same powers as their predecessors. The superior ecclesiastical authority can dispense or absolve from penalties inflicted by the inferior; hence the Roman Pontiff may dispense or absolve from penalties inflicted by the Ordinaries in virtue of their ordinary power, even if the case was reserved, not by common, but by diocesan law.

Finally, those who are commissioned by superiors may 2 He needs no reason because of his plenitude of power in foro externo, but if the contrition or attrition required for absolution in the sacramental forum should be wanting, the absolution may be valid in foro externo, but without effect in foro interno.

3 Ratione delicti (can. 1566, § 1) the ordinary in whose diocese the crime has been committed, is competent to absolve.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dispense or absolve in virtue of that commission within the limits of their mandate. The Vicar-General, as he needs a special commission to inflict penalties,[4] also needs a special commission to dispense or absolve from them.

§ 2. Those who may exempt from the observance of a law, may also remit the penal sanction attached to the same, and consequently render the delinquent immune from punishment. Note that the inferior, say the Ordinary, cannot exempt from common law, because eximere a lege supposes a legislative power not granted to the Ordinaries with regard to the common law. For this the Ordinaries, i. e., all prelates inferior to the Pope, need special faculties. However, can. 81 would also seem to apply here;[5] also can. 66, § 3, which requires a faculty in order to be capable of receiving a favor or privilege. The faculty to dispense from certain laws, e. g., impediments, does not include the faculty to absolve from the penalties, e. g., of excommunication, but only the power to absolve from the penalty ad hoc, i. e., to obtain the favor.[6]

§ 3. The judge who ex officio applies a penalty established by a superior, cannot remit the penalty once inflicted. Having rendered the sentence, his office is completed.

The judge is not above the law, but subject to it.

THE ORDINARY'S POWER WITH REGARD TO COMMON LAW

Can. 2237

§1. In casibus publicis potest Ordinarius poenas latae sententiae iure communi statutas remittere, exceptis:

4 See can. 2220, § 2.

5 Concerning censures, special provisions are made in can. 2254.

6 See can. 2265, § 2; Eichmann, l. c., p. 72.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1.° Casibus ad forum contentiosum deductis;

2.° Censuris Sedi Apostolicae reservatis;

3.° Poenis inhabilitatis ad beneficia, officia, dignitates, munera in Ecclesia, vocem activam et passivam eorumve privationis, suspensionis perpetuae, infamiae iuris, privationis iuris patronatus et privilegii seu gratiae a Sede Apostolica concessae.

§ 2. In casibus vero occultis, firmo praescripto can. 2254 et 2290 potest Ordinarius poenas latae sententiae iure communi statutas per se vel per alium remittere, exceptis censuris specialissimo vel speciali modo Sedi Apostolicae reservatis.

§ 1. The Ordinary may remit all penalties latæ sententiae, either corrective or vindictive, established by common law, except the following:

a) Cases brought before the civil ecclesiastical court, as when civil action is instituted in order to obtain damages for a crime.[7]

b) Cases reserved to the Apostolic See, either simply, or especially, or most especially.[8]

c) Penalties entailing inability to hold benefices, offices,[9] dignities in the Church, penalties referring to the active and passive vote and privation thereof, perpetual suspension, infamy by law, privation of advowson, and privileges or favors granted by the Apostolic See.

As to the public character of crimes, see can. 2197.

The power of Ordinaries is here restricted perhaps more than some authors were inclined to admit.[10] But the underlying reason is that given by these authors, viz.,

7 See can. 2210, § 1, n 2.

8 See can. 2245, § 3.

9 Munera, i. e., charges of any kind, for instance, rector, lector, sexton.

10 Thesaurus-Giraldi, l. c., P. I, c. 23, ed. cit., p. 30.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

that too frequent recourse to the Apostolic See be not required. Besides, there is no doubt that minor crimes also are here supposed, because all the reserved censures are excluded. But the text also excludes from the power of the Ordinary a category which was formerly considered as included therein, at least if the penalty had no special clause attached.[11] The reason for this restriction is palpable: all the cases enumerated under n. 3 concern the public welfare of the Church, not merely that of the delinquent.

The term "Ordinary" is limited here, as the Ordinary cannot delegate another (can. 2237, § 2). But all the Ordinaries mentioned in can. 198 are included. And since the text simply says "Ordinary," the superiors of exempt clerical orders enjoy this power over their subjects.

§ 2 of can. 2237 refers to occult cases with due regard to censures (can. 2254) and occult vindictive penalties (can. 2290). Now in such cases latae sententiae, established by common law, the Ordinary as well as any one delegated by him may remit the penalties. An exception to this general rule are the censures which are reserved either specialissimo or speciali modo to the Holy See. In occult cases, the Ordinary may delegate another, as per can. 199, § 2, either for each separate case or habitually.

CONDITIONS AND MODE OF PARDON

Can. 2238

Poenae remissio, vi aut metu gravi extorta, ipso iure irrita est.

11 Thesaurus-Giraldi, l. c.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Can. 2239

§1. Poena valide remitti potest praesenti vel absenti, absolute vel sub conditione, in foro externo vel interno tantum.

§2. Licet poena etiam oretenus remitti possit, si tamen scripto inflicta fuerit, expedit ut etiam eius remissio scriptis concedatur.

Can. 2240.

Ad praescriptionem actionis poenalis quod attinet, servetur dispositio can. 1703.

The remission of any penalty, whether by absolution or dispensation, if extorted by physical compulsion or grave fear, is ipso iure invalid. Hence serious threats to use the civil power, which the abominable appellatio ab abusu [12] sometimes resorted to, are without avail either in the internal or the external forum.

A penalty may be remitted not only when the person is present, but also when he is absent,[13] either unconditionally or with a condition attached, for instance, to present himself to the superior, or provided the amendment has lasted for a certain length of time. A remission may be valid either in the court of conscience only or in the external forum only.

Although a penalty may be remitted by word of mouth it is more expedient that it be done in writing, if the penalty was inflicted in writing. But writing is not required for the validity of a dispensation or absolution. As to prescription of penal actions see can. 1703 (Vol. VII of this commentary, pp. 148 sqq.).

12 Cfr. can. 2334, n. 4.

13 Of course, in foro interno or, rather, in the sacramental forum, personal presence is required.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

SECTION II
PENALTIES IN PARTICULAR

TITLE VIII
CORRECTIVE PENALTIES OR CENSURES

CHAPTER I

CENSURES IN GENERAL

Can. 2241

§1. Censura est poena qua homo baptizatus, delinquens et contumax, quibusdam bonis spiritualibus vel spiritualibus adnexis privatur, donec, a contumacia recedens, absolvatur.

§2. Censurae, praesertim latae sententiae, maxime excommunicatio, ne infligantur, nisi sobrie et magna cum circumspectione.

Can. 2242

§1. Censura punitur tantummodo delictum externum, grave, consummatum, cum contumacia coniunctum; potest autem ferri censura etiam in delinquentes ignotos.

§2. Si agatur de censuris ferendae sententiae, contumax est qui, non obstantibus monitionibus de quibus in can. 2233, §2, a delicto non desistit vel patrati delicti poenitentiam cum debita damnorum et scandali

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

reparatione agere detrectat; ad incurrendam vero censuram latae sententiae sufficit transgressio legis vel praecepti cui sit adnexa latae sententiae poena, nisi reus legitima causa ab hac excusetur.

§ 3. Contumaciam desiisse dicendum est, cum reum vere delicti commissi poenituerit et simul ipse congruam satisfactionem pro damnis et scandalo dederit aut saltem serio promiserit; iudicare autem utrum poenitentia vera sit, satisfactio congrua aut eiusdem promissio seria, necne, illius est, a quo censurae absolutio petitur.

The term censure is derived from the Latin censura, which originally signified registration, much in the same sense as our modern census. The office of censores was created in 443 B. C. and gradually extended to the regimen morum, or supervision of public morals, later to the arrangements for the collection of the public revenue and the execution of public works. As censors or inspectors of public morals the censores were empowered to brand with disgrace (ignominia) those guilty of acts which, although not forbidden by any penal statute, were denounced by public opinion. The branding with disgrace was termed notio, or notatio, or animadversio censoria, and the disgrace inflicted by it, nota censoria. To inflict this note no previous judicial investigation or examination of witnesses was required, and the only effect of the nota censoria, in itself, was to affix a stigma to the individual. But, in addition to the mere disgrace thus inflicted, the censors could, to a certain extent, deprive the object of their displeasure of public honors and privileges, but neither the dishonor nor the degradation were necessarily permanent.[1]

1 Ramsay-Lanciani, Roman Antiquities, 1901, p. 198 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Ecclesiastical terminology was uncertain up to the time of Innocent III (1198–1216), inasmuch as all kinds of ecclesiastical penalties were understood by censures. But a decretal of the above-named Pontiff restricted the term censura to interdict, suspension, and excommunication,[2] and this meaning was thenceforth permanently established.[3] A censure then is defined by the Code as a penalty by which a baptized person, delinquent and contumacious, is deprived of certain spiritual goods or goods connected with spiritual ones, until he has given up his contumacy, and obtained absolution.

1) Censures generically belong to the class of penalties, because they contain all the marks of a penalty.[4] Hence, although the corrective element is foremost in censures, the character of penalty as retribution and reparation is not entirely wanting.

2) The subject of censures must be baptized, delinquent, and stubborn.

a) Homo baptizatus alone is the subject of censures; no brute[5] is capable of punishment in the proper sense. Baptism is necessary because the Church does not exercise her judiciary power except over those who belong to her fold.[6] Consequently not even catechumens are subject to ecclesiastical censures. On the other hand, any one who is validly baptized, no matter what religion or creed or sect he may profess, is de iure subject to ecclesiastical censures.[7] Baptized non-Catholics, because of the

2 C. 20, X, V, 40.

3 Hinschius, l. c., V, 125, note 4; Hollweck, l. c., p. 84, note 1.

4 See can. 2215.

5 The anathema sometimes hurled at irrational creatures—as we read in ancient documents—must be understood of execration and detestation, not of punishment involving guilt; Ballerini-Palmieri, Opus Theol. Morale, 1894, ed. 2, Vol. VII, p. 20, n. 49.

6 Trid., Sess. XIV, c. 2. de ref.

7 Trid., Sess. VII, can. 7; can. 12; Suarez, De Censuris, disp. V, sect. 1, n. 25 (XXIII, 156).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google indelible character of Baptism, are also theoretically subject to censures, but these are not enforced against them by reason either of opportunity, or lack of the necessary assistance, or infeasibility. Besides, there is no doubt that the legislator has only Catholics in view, at least directly.

It is hardly necessary to state that only a living man can be properly censured. If excommunication was at one time inflicted on the dead, it was only as a warning to the living not to give them ecclesiastical burial or offer ecclesiastical suffrages for their repose. Consequently also the absolution given to such as died with signs of penance, refers to the living and not to the dead.[8]

b) A censure can be inflicted only for a delictum (crime). This is described in can. 2195, and further explained in can. 2242, § 1. Only an external, grievous, consummated and stubborn crime is censurable.

External is here used in opposition, not to occult, but merely to internal sinful acts, as, for instance, an internal heresy which remains entirely within the mind and is never manifested.[9] A crime on the other hand (for instance, homicide), may be wholly occult, and yet external.

The crime must be grievous or grave, because the external act itself must be grievously culpable. The reason lies in the gravity of the penalty, which, ultimately meaning exclusion from the kingdom of heaven, should 8 Ballerini-Palmieri, l. c., n. 48.

9 Ibid., p. 64, n. 133: "neque sufficit, quod quis, v.g., intendens haeresim confirmare, mensam percutiat aut dicat: ita est, quia per hoc non significatur haeresis exterius." But if one would say to himself: "I don't believe," or purposely and with heretical intent refuse to genuflect or bow (like the Greeks) to the Blessed Sacrament, he would manifest his heretical belief externally.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

not be inflicted except for such crimes as render one unworthy to enter that kingdom.[10] But it must be observed that, according to the common teaching of the schools, a censure may be threatened even for a less serious transgression, which in itself would not amount to a grievous or mortal sin, provided the matter may become serious by reason of scandal, or danger, or the purpose for which the censure is threatened. Thus a theft, the matter of which would constitute only a light fault, might cause serious loss to a church.[11] Thus, also, a percussio levis clericorum (see can. 2343, §4) may be placed under excommunication in order to prevent greater evil and to enforce respect for the clerical state.

The proportion between the penalty and the reason for which it is threatened must be reasonable.

The next characteristic of a crime is that it be consummated (comsummatum sive completum in genere suo). This is verified when the effect of the forbidden act has followed. Beyond the intention of the legislator the penal law cannot bind. For instance, the violation of enclosure is complete if the whole body has moved within the forbidden precinct (can. 2343). However, the legislator may also punish an inchoate or attempted crime. For instance, can. 2333 lays under excommunication the prohibentes promulgationem vel executionem litteras vel acta Apostolicae Sedis. This class of persons incur excommunication, but the Apostolic letters may be promulgated or executed notwithstanding this unjust prohibition, which is against ecclesiastical liberty. Therefore the wording and context of the law must be weighed.[12]

10 S. Thomas, Summa Theol., III, Suppl., qu. 21, art. 3.

11 Suarez, l. c., disp. IV, sect. 6, n. 12 f.; see can. 2326.

12 Ballerini-Palmieri, l. c., VII, p. 65, n. 135 f. and n. 139.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

c) The person to be censured must be contumacious, in other words, crime must be connected with contumacy. Although contumacy in legal parlance is defined as contempt of court, the term has also a wider meaning, viz., persistent disobedience, which is more explicitly described in can. 2242, § 2.

Persistent disobedience presupposes knowledge of the law which forbids acts under censure (can. 2209). It also supposes that the act perpetrated against the law is not only a past act, but endures as to its vicious character; because censures are corrective penalties.[13] Hence if penance is done and reparation is made, no censures can be inflicted.

When does contumacy exist? The Code, can. 2242, §2, distinguishes between a censure ferendae and a censure latae sententiae. The former requires a canonical admonition. Hence the ecclesiastical superior must, according to can. 2143, issue a formal warning, in the presence either of the chancellor or of another official of the episcopal court, or before two witnesses, or by registered letter, bidding the culprit to cease his criminal conduct or to do penance for the crime committed and to repair the damage and scandal done. Time must be given in order to await the result of the warning, and only after the term granted has expired without the desired result, may contumacy be assumed.[14] If no criminal warning was issued, the sentence, even though valid,[15] is unjust, and recourse or appeal is open to the censured. This warning may, but need not, be repeated.

The judgment as to the existence of contumacy lies with the superior. In order to incur a censure latae sententiae,

13 Wernz, l. c., VI, n. 155, p. 164.
14 See can. 2283, § 2.
15 It would be invalid in the cases mentioned in can. 1892 and 1894; Eichmann, l. c., p. 77.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

all that is required is to transgress the law or precept to which the penalty latae sententiae is attached, unless the culprit has a lawful reason or excuse. Consequently, there is no need of canonical admonition, since the penal law itself, threatening the penalty to be incurred ipso facto, contains this admonition.[16] The clause: "nisi reus legitima causa ab hac excusetur" must be referred to the reasons for or against imputability, as explained in can. 2199–2206 and 2229.

Contumacy may be said to cease (can. 2242, §3) when the delinquent repents of the crime he has committed, makes proportionate satisfaction for the damage he has caused and repairs the scandal given, or at least seriously promises to do so. Whether the repentence is sincere, the satisfaction sufficient, or the promise serious, must be judged by the one who is asked to give absolution.

Here it may be added that a promise under oath is not demanded by our text, although the Roman Ritual[17] appears to require it.

It should be clearly understood that these marks of crime must all concur simultaneously; if but one of them is lacking no censure is incurred.

3. The effect of a censure is privation of certain spiritual goods or things connected therewith. This is the proximate purpose or effect of censures, which are spiritual penalties and therefore deprive the delinquent of spiritual benefits. When temporal goods are mentioned, they must be related to spiritual goods. Thus, e. g., a suspension (qua censure) may deprive a cleric of bene-

16 Cfr. c. 26, X, II, 28. Concerning a declaratory sentence required for a censure latae sententiae, see can. 2223, § 4. A censure latae sententiae which requires a declaratory sentence only, need not be preceded by a canonical admonition; see Suarez, l. c., disp. III, sect. 10, n. 19 ff.; Ballerini-Palmieri, l. c., VII, p. 82, n. 165 f.

17 Tit. III, c. 3, n. 2; see c. 15, X, V, 39.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ficiary emoluments, but only in relation to his office, which is something spiritual. Excommunication may deprive one of exercising legitimate functions, but only in order to ecclesiastical office; it may also render one vitandus, but only with regard to the faithful as such. The specific benefits of which the censured are deprived are enumerated under the single headings. Although privation is the main and primary effect of censure enforcement, yet obedience and submission, repair of damage and scandal are also intended as subordinate ends.[18]

4. Censures do not cease automatically with contumacy and subsequent amendment, but require formal absolution. It would be scandalous, to say the least, to teach that censures cease in the court of conscience after the culprit has amended his conduct and is no longer contumacious;[19] see can. 2248 ff.

Can. 2241, §2 admonishes all concerned to make a sober and careful use of censures, especially of censures latae sententiae, and more particularly of excommunication. This warning of the Council of Trent[20] has repeatedly been emphasized. Thus missionaries were told not to be misled by civil governors into pronouncing censures in order to ascertain the temporal estates of deceased persons.[21] The S. Congregation also refused to permit Vicars Apostolic to censure those who trafficked in or used opium or arach. The reason given was that censures constitute the very nerve of ecclesiastical discipline and should therefore be used sparingly and for grave, canonical, and approved reasons only.[22]

18 Suarez, l. c., disp. VI, sect. 1, nn. 1–3 (XXIII, 175).

19 Prop. 44. damn. a S. O., March 18, 1666 (Denzinger, n. 1015).

20 Sess. XXIV, c. 3, de ref.

21 S. C. P. F., Aug. 18, 1760 (Coll., n. 434).

22 S. C. P. F., June 23, 1830; Sept. 30, 1848 (Coll., nn. 815, 1085).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Excommunications may also be inflicted on unknown delinquents, says can. 2242, §1. For although the intention must be directed to a certain subject, yet if that person is determined in one way or another, it is sufficient for the censure to bind him, even though he may be unknown as such or such, but merely as the perpetrator.[23] There is no difficulty as to a censure latae sententiae, because this censure is incurred by the very perpetration of the deed, but it may need a declaratory sentence. Censures ferendae sententiae require canonical admonition. A public edict issued either in the church or in some official publication would be sufficient.[24]

APPEAL OR RECOURSE FROM CENSURES

Can. 2243

§1. Censurae inflictae per sententiam iudicialem, statim ac latae fuerint, exsecutionem secumferunt, nec ab eis datur appellatio, nisi in devolutivo; item a censuris ad modum praecepti inflictis datur recursus, sed in devolutivo tantum.

§2. Appellatio vero vel recursus a sententia iudiciali vel praecepto comminante censuras etiam latae sententiae nondum contractas, nec sententiam aut praeceptum nec censuras suspendunt, si agatur de re in qua ius non admittit appellationem vel recursum etiam cum effectu suspensivo; secus censuras suspendunt, firma tamen obligatione servandi id quod sententia aut praecepto mandatur, nisi reus appellationem vel recursum interposuerit non a sola poena, sed ab ipsa quoque sententia vel praecepto.

23 Suarez, De Censuris, disp. V. sect. 2, n. 2 f. (Vol. XXIII, 158 f.)

24 Ibid., disp. III, sect. 11, n. 5 (XXIII, 65).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Ecclesiastical discipline requires that prelates in inflicting penalties for the correction and reformation of morals should not be handicapped by dilatory appeals.[25] Therefore, the Code safeguards the authority of the ecclesiastical judge by clearly eliminating censures latae sententiae, which require no execution of the sentence, but go into effect automatically. But a censure inflicted a iure tantum may here be understood because, according to can. 2217, §1, n. 3, it may require a condemnatory sentence, which would certainly mean a judicial sentence. But a censure inflicted ab homine, by way of a special precept, like that of the suspensio ex informata conscientia, is here expressly mentioned.

Note the difference between appeal and recourse; an appeal supposes a judiciary sentence, a recourse, either a decree or a decision; an appeal is permitted to a tribunal only, recourses are disposed of administratively by the Roman Congregations.[26]

§1 of can. 2243 rules:

1. That censures inflicted by judiciary sentence take effect immediately and must, as a rule, be carried out. An appeal, if properly lodged, has a devolutive effect, i. e., the whole case is thrown upon the court of appeal, but the one thus censured must conduct himself as if he were censured, i. e., abstain from every act of order, jurisdiction, or administration forbidden by the censure. However, this text evidently presupposes that the sentence was valid; and since the text speaks of a judiciary sentence, its validity may be impaired for three reasons; (a) if the judge had no jurisdiction at all, as, for instance, a superior who has resigned or otherwise gone out of office; (b) if an essential form was neglected, for 25 C. 13, X, I, 31. 26 Can. 1601.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

instance, the summons; (c) if the reason was unjust or insufficient, because the penalty, being a grave one, requires a just and reasonable cause for being inflicted. Whenever one of these reasons occurs, the censure does not bind. What is to be done? The whole judgment must be reversed, for an appeal proper is impossible, as can. 1880, 3° clearly states. But here it must also be noted that, although the exception of nullity may be lodged after a definite sentence (Benedict XIV, "Ad militantis," n. 36), yet the exception of nullity does not, as a rule, impede the execution of the sentence. We said "as a rule," for if the nullity is evident or notorious, or can be immediately proved, the exception quashes the effect of the sentence or execution.[27]

2. The text states that from censures inflicted by way of precept only recourse, and that in devolutivo, is permitted. Thus a suspensio ex informata conscientia admits only recourse to the S. C. Concilii, in devolutivo. But note well that only censures, not vindictive penalties, have this devolutive effect.

§2 of can. 2243 regards censures not yet inflicted or incurred, but merely threatened. The threat may be pronounced by a judge in the form of a judiciary sentence, although the law itself may have determined the penalty (i. e., censure), or it may be pronounced by a superior in the form of a special precept, as is prescribed for non-residing pastors. A superior of exempt clerical religious may issue such a precept in an important matter of discipline. Again notice the difference between appeal and recourse with suspensive or devolutive effect:

1. If the matter is such as to admit of no appeal or recourse with suspensive effect, such an appeal or recourse

27 Can. 1892.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

suspends neither the judiciary sentence (or precept) nor the censure threatened but not yet incurred, even though it be a censure latae sententiae. No appeal is allowed in the cases mentioned in can. 1880. Recourse in devolutivo only is provided in can. 345, 513, §2, 1340, §3, 1395 and 1428, §3.

2. If the matter in question admits of an appeal or a recourse with suspensive effect, then a twofold hypothesis is possible.

a) The appellant may lodge his appeal against the censure only, without dodging or shirking the obligation of fulfilling the command stated in the sentence or precept. In that case the censure is suspended, but the obligation of complying with the substance of the sentence or precept remains. For instance, the sentence may demand restitution of stolen church property or reparation of damage caused by homicide, robbery, incendiarism,[28] or by giving up a supposed marriage or concubinage.[29]

b) If the appeal or recourse is lodged not only against the penalty (i. e., the censure), but also against the sentence or precept which supposedly contains both penalty and obligation, both are suspended. Hence the appellant is neither censured nor obliged to repair eventual damages or perform the act prescribed by the sentence or precept.

MULTIPLICATION OF CENSURES

Can. 2244

§1. Non solum diversae, sed etiam eiusdem speciei censura potest in eodem subiecto multiplicari.

§2. Censura latae sententiae multiplicatur:

28 See can. 2346; 2348; 2354; 2401.

29 See can. 2356; 2357, § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1.° Si diversa delicta, quorum singula censuram secumferunt, eadem vel distincta actione committantur;

2.° Si idem delictum, censura punitum, pluries repetatur ita ut plura sint delicta distincta;

3.° Si delictum, diversis censuris a distinctis Superioribus punitum, semel aut pluries committatur.

§3. Censura ab homine multiplicatur, si plura praecepta vel plures sententiae vel plures distinctae partes eiusdem praecepti aut sententiae suam quaeque censuram infligant.

The whole or at least the main difficulty concerning the multiplication of censures seems to arise from their effect, i. e., the privation of spiritual benefits. Suarez refutes it effectively.[30] Privation is indeed the primary object or end of censures, not, indeed, mere privation, but its positive cause, and this may be multifarious. Mortal sin, for instance, deprives the soul of sanctifying grace, and, when multiplied, produces a multitude of stains.

Besides, one censure does not exhaust the power of the ecclesiastical judge, which, on the contrary, remains intact, and may, therefore, again be used against the same delinquent.

Finally, multiplied censures are intended to terrify and deter, and to lend additional weight to the authority of the law.

The multiplication of censures is necessarily bound up with the specific and numerical distinction of sins; and therefore the difficulties besetting this subject also adhere in the one here under discussion.

The Code begins by stating that censures may be multiplied, not only specifically, but also numerically in one 30 De Censuris, disp. V, sect. 2, n. 6.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and the same subject. Thus a man may be excommunicated, suspended, and interdicted all at the same time, as we know from the common formula of absolution. Neither is there any difficulty in that, because these privations differ. The objection mentioned above is directed only against the same kind of censure. May one be twice excommunicated? The Code says, yes, and then distinguishes between censures latae sententiae and censures ab homine.

1. Censures latae sententiae are multiplied:

a) When several crimes, each of which has a censure attached, are committed by the same act or by different acts.

This is a specific distinction of crimes, although the act may be one and the same, or the acts may be morally and physically distinct. If the acts differ, the case is evident. But if the act is, at least physically, one and the same, it seems strange that two or more censures should follow. Yet if we distinguish the reasons for the sources from which the censures are established, it is but logical to assume diversity, as of causes, so of effects. Take the example of one dragging a bishop by force before a lay tribunal. There would be a violation of can. 2341 and of can. 2343, §3 (privilegium fori and canonis). A nun with solemn vows and papal enclosure, who would leave the enclosure to contract civil marriage before a non-Catholic minister, would incur four censures, viz., under can. 2319, §1, n. 1, can. 2341, 3, can. 2385 (as apostate), and can. 2388,—all these being specified censures inflicted for specific reasons.

b) There is also multiplication if the same crime is repeated so that the repeated acts constitute distinct crimes. Two characteristics distinguish acts from one another interruption and diversity of object. If an act is morally and physically interrupted, so that the posterior act is not coherent with the anterior, these acts are distinct. On the other hand, if an act lasts for some time, but is inspired by the same motive and continued under the same impetus, the act is one, for instance, a protracted beating of a clergyman.[31] When the object or matter of one criminal act is diverse, authors differ as to the multiplication of censures. For instance, if one would bring two clergymen before a lay tribunal or converse with two vitandi at the same time, or would kill two clerics by the same stroke, Suarez and others believe it probable that only one censure would be incurred, because the action is essentially one and constitutes but one sin.[32] The Code is not against this assumption.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

c) If a crime laid under diverse censures by various superiors is perpetrated once or oftener, a multiplication of censures may be incurred. The reason is that the two superiors may have different reasons for decreeing the censure. However, it must be clearly understood that there is question here not only of a double or emphatic prohibition, but of a double or multiplied censure. Now can. 2247, §1 forbids Ordinaries to put under censure crimes which are already forbidden under the same penalty by the Apostolic See. Consequently the censures mentioned in the Code as reserved to the Apostolic See cannot again be inflicted by inferior prelates. Note that we here treat of censures latae sententiae, which need no admonition.[33] Hence the case can concern only a lay-

31 C. 27, X, V, 39.

32 De Censuris, disp. V, sect, 3, n. 3 ff.

33 What Suarez (l. c., disp. V, sect. 3, n. 13) and Ballerini-Palmieri (l. c., Vol. VII, n. 113, p. 55 ff.) say, is not to the point; and what Ayrinhac (l. c., p. 93) says, appears like an evasion of the difficulty.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

man or a clergyman or religious who has different superiors. Thus if a layman has several bishops, because he has more than one domicile, the different bishops may censure him; a religious, too, may have different superiors, —the provincial or general of his institute, and the local Ordinary as far as pastoral duties are concerned.

One difficulty remains: What is meant by "diversis censuris"? Does it mean specifically or numerically different censures? If specifically different, it would mean excommunication or suspension or interdict. This seems to be the meaning of our text, although the Decretals,[34] from which it is apparently taken, only mention excommunication, which is said to have been incurred severally, because inflicted by several prelates.

2. The next class of multiplied censures is that of censurae ab homine. There is no difficulty as to the multiplication of these, because the various reasons constitute as many titles, and each sentence presupposes a clear title for a distinct pronunciamento on diverse matters judged or commanded. Therefore, if several ordinances or several sentences (which of course suppose diverse objects) have been issued under censure, censures are multiplied in proportion to the number of precepts and sentences transgressed. Besides, if the sentence or precept is divisible, and hence composed of several parts, each of which is emphasized by a special censure, the censures are also multiplied. Here the intention of the superior or judge must be clearly manifested, and besides, the admonition must be made for each and every sentence or precept and for every specific part thereof.[35]

[34] C. 42, X. V, 39; but c. 27 ibid. refers to diverse crimes; thus one may be interdicted by the Pope and excommunicated or suspended by the ordinary; Eichmann, p. 80.

[35] Suarez, l. c., disp. V, sect. 2, n. 13.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

In asserting a multiplication of censures, either latae sententiae or ab homine, it must be remembered that all the conditions enumerated above must concur, not only in one, but in each and every censure; else one censure may be incurred, but not the other. The consequence of such verified or not-verified multiplication is important in reference to absolution.

RESERVATION OF CENSURES

Can. 2245

§1. Censurae aliae sunt reservatae, aliae non reservatae.

§2. Censura ab homine est reservata ei qui censuram inflixit aut sententiam tulit, eiusve Superiori competenti, vel successori aut delegato; ex censuris vero a iure reservatis aliae sunt reservatae Ordinario, aliae Apostolicae Sedi.

§3. E reservatis Apostolicae Sedi aliae sunt reservatae simpliciter, aliae speciali modo, aliae specialissimo modo.

§4. Censura latae sententiae non est reservata, nisi in lege vel praecepto id expresse dicatur; et in dubio sive iuris sive facti reservatio non urget.

Can. 2246

§ 1. Ne reservetur censura, nisi attenta peculiari gravitate delictorum et necessitate aptius providendi disciplinae ecclesiasticae et medendi conscientiis fidelium.

§2. Reservatio strictam recipit interpretationem.

§3. Reservatio censurae impedientis receptionem

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Sacramentorum importat reservationem peccati cui censura adnexa est; verum si quis a censura excusatur vel ab eadem fuit absolutus, reservatio peccati penitus cessat.

Can. 2247

§1. Si censura Sedi Apostolicae reservata sit, Ordinarius nequit aliam censuram sibi reservatam in idem delictum ferre.

§2. Reservatio censurae in particulari territorio vim suam extra illius territorii fines non exserit, etiamsi censuratus ad absolutionem obtinendam e territorio egrediatur; censura vero ab homine est ubique locorum reservata ita ut censuratus nullibi absolvi sine debitis facultatibus possit.

§3. Si confessarius, ignorans reservationem, poenitentem a censura ac peccato absolvat, absolutio censurae valet, dummodo ne sit censura ab homine aut censura specialissimo modo Sedi Apostolicae reservata.

Elsewhere,[36] in sketching the historical development of reservation, we said that reservation to the "Apostolic Lord" of the more atrocious crimes was a well-known practice, especially since the twelfth century, and was connected with pilgrimages to Rome as well as with the decline of public penance. Can. 893, §2 calls the restriction of the absolving power an avocatio, i. e., a calling of certain cases before a higher tribunal. By earlier authors reservation was defined as "restrictio iurisdictionis in odium delinquentis." This definition gave way to another, called the most common one by St. Alphonsus: "restrictio iurisdictionis, ut delinquentes judicium prudentiorum [36] See Vol. IV, of our Commentary, pp. 311 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

subeant." [37] This latter definition may appeal to tender souls, but historically and theologically speaking it has not much foundation, if exclusively understood of the higher and more prudent judgment to which the penitent has to submit. For there is no doubt that the grievousness or atrocity of the crime was the decisive element in reserving cases. To bring home to the delinquent the fact of the heinousness of his crime was another object of reservation. That by undertaking a pilgrimage to Rome in those days this thought was vividly presented to the culprit, goes without saying. Thus the Church did a truly social work. It appears to us that the idea of the mere prudent judgment of a case overlooks the penal character of censures and their corrective or reformatory purpose.[38] No doubt some prelates may have had misgivings or suffered from lack of necessary knowledge in treating very serious cases. But this was not true of all, nor could there have been wanting suitable clergymen to advise the bishops. The Code, in the definition quoted above, treats reservation as restrictive of jurisdiction, which is quite intelligible from a juridical point of view. However, our view of reservation seems to receive weight from can. 2246, §1.

The common-law (a iure) censures reserved to the Ordinary are the following mentioned in can. 2319; 2326; 2339; 2341 (third clause); 2342, § 4; 2350; 2375; 2388, §2. Can 2385 reserves the case of apostasy to the exempt religious superior.

Censures reserved simpliciter to the Holy See are those named in can. 2327, 2335; 2338, §1; 2338, §2; 2341 (sec-

37 Theol. Moralis, VI, n. 581.

38 Thus also Hollweck, l. c., p. 107; Ballerini in the notes to Gury's Theol. Moral., II, n. 571.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ond clause); 2342; 2346; 2351, §1; 2370; 2371; 2372; 2373; 2387; 2388, § 1; 2392, n. 1; 2405.

Can. 2245 distinguishes

1° between reserved and non-reserved censures

2° Reserved
- 1° ab homine
  - a) to the one who inflicted the censure or sentence
  - b) to the former's superior, successor or delegate.

or

2° Reserved
- 2° a jure
  - a) to the Ordinary (81 cases or canons)
    - a) simpliciter (16)
    - b) speciali modo (13)
    - c) specialissimo modo (4)
  - b) to the Apostolic See reserved

Speciali modo reserved to the Apostolic See are those mentioned in can. 2341; 2318, § 1; 2322, n. 1; 2330 (and "Vacante Sede," n. 81); 2332; 2333; 2334; 2341 (first clause); 2343, §2, n. 1; 2343, §3; 2345; 2360, §1; 2363.

Specialissimo modo reserved to the Apostolic See are those mentioned in can. 2320; 2343, §1; 2367; 2369, §1.

§4 of can. 2245 states that censures latae sententiae are reserved only if the reservation is expressly stated in the law or precept which contains or threatens the reservation. If there be a doubt concerning reservation, the latter need not be observed, i. e., any confessor may absolve therefrom.[39]

The doubt may concern either the law (dubium iuris) or [39] Neither is an absolution ad cautelam there and then required, nor is recourse necessary, or a renewed absolution, if the doubt has afterwards been cleared away; Cappello, l. c., p. 24.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

a fact (dubium facti). A solid doubt in regard to law is, for instance, in a case of abortion, whether the law comprises the mandatarius as well as the mandans (see can. 2350). A dubium facti would be whether the non-Catholic minister before whom the parties contracted a marriage, acted as minister of his denomination or merely as justice of the peace, i. e., as civil magistrate. Note, however, that the doubt here mentioned does not concern the censured person as much as the one who is to absolve him from censure. Of course, if the parties did not know of the censure, there can be no contumacy, and consequently no censure.[40]

Can. 2246, §1 enjoins moderation in the reservation of censures, and mentions three reasons for which a censure may be reserved: (1) the specially serious or grievous character of the crime, as stated in can. 897, and inculcated by the Council of Trent;[41] (2) the necessity of properly guarding ecclesiastical discipline, because it may be that at sundry times and in diverse places reservation may do more harm than good, as, for instance, in times of persecution, in provinces far distant with but few ministers,[42] whilst certain tendencies and public manifestations of specified vicious inclinations may demand more radical means; (3) the necessity of offering a remedy to the conscience of the faithful, whose character and conduct also differ in different places, at various times, and under various conditions.[43]

§2 of can. 2246 sets forth the well-known rule that the reservation of censures must be strictly interpreted, be-

40 Hence it would be well to ask the parties whether they knew that such a marriage was forbidden under censure.

41 Sess. 14, c. 7, de poenit.

42 S. C. P. F., June 6, 1817, n. 14 (Coll., n. 723).

43 Benedict XIV, "A quo primum," June 14, 1757, § 8; De Syn. Dioec., V, 5; see this Commentary, Vol. IV, p. 323 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

cause restrictions are not favors which may be stretched, and because penalties should be interpreted in the milder sense.[44] However, it is evident that when the wording of a reserved censure is plain, it must be taken in its obvious sense. Besides, a reserved censure may have a twofold aspect: It may be favorable to a certain class of persons and unfavorable to another class. Thus the privilegium canonis (2343) is favorable to the clerical state and may therefore be widely interpreted; but as far as it concerns those who attack clerics, it is unfavorable, and must therefore be restricted to "percussores" in the strict sense.[45] Hence no extension from person to person, from case to case, in other words, no analogous interpretation is permissible.

If the wording is ambiguous the interpretation of the school, and consequently any probable opinion, may be followed.[46]

§3 of can. 2246 settles a controversy concerning episcopal reserved censures. The text has two clauses, and the first contains a condition not specially expressed.

1. Reservation of a censure may (a) prevent one from receiving the sacraments, and such a reservation involves reservation of the sin to which the censure is attached. This is the case in excommunication; e.g., can. 2319, §1, n. 1, says that parties contracting marriage before a non-Catholic minister cannot licitly receive the sacraments until the censure is removed by the Ordinary. This reservation, therefore, concerns the sin itself.

(b) Reservation may not prevent one from receiving the sacraments, and then the sin is not reserved, even though the censure is. Consequently, a suspended cleric

44 Reg. Iuris 15 and 49 in 6°.

45 Reiffenstuel, in Reg. Iuris 15, n. 9.

46 Ballerini-Palmieri, Opus Theol. Morale, V, n. 725, p. 397, ed. 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

may be absolved from the sin that was the cause of a reserved censure by any confessor, though the censure remains and, therefore, if a subdeacon, he cannot be promoted to deaconship.[47]

2. If one is excused from censure, or has been absolved therefrom, reservation of the sin ceases entirely. Hence ignorance[48] of the censure or lack of any of the conditions that are required for incurring censures, render any reservation null and void. Can. 2319, §1, n. 1, quoted above, may be to the point. Ignorance of censures, grave fear, lack of consent (for it happens that exterior consent only is given in order to avoid scandal) may excuse from censure.

Now this §3 must certainly be applied to episcopal cases, i. e., such as a bishop reserves to himself, in virtue not of the law, but of his ordinary power. The rule here is general, not restricted to papal cases.[49]

Can. 2247, §1 forbids Ordinaries to attach another censure reserved to themselves to a crime already reserved to the Apostolic See. The reason for this very practical law consists partly in the superiority of the Apostolic See and partly in a desire to avoid a multiplication of censures.[50] The words "nequit ferre" (cannot decree) is more forcible than the text of the Holy Office, which uses abstineant, although even the "nequit" does not entail invalidity. "Aliam censuram" means that no other reserved censure, at least of the same kind, can be licitly added. Hence two excommunications, for instance, on can. 2318, may not be pronounced against

47 See can. 2283.

48 According to can. 2202, § 2, see also can. 2229.

49 Ballerini-Palmieri, l. c., maintained this view.

50 See Reg. Iuris 54 in 6°; S. O., July 13, 1916 (A. Ap. S., III, 313).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the authors and editors of certain forbidden books.[51] A non-reserved censure, even of the same kind, might be permitted, but should rather be avoided, in order not to increase the penalties. The general wording of the text —"alia censura" — appears to exclude even censures of diverse kinds; — excommunication, interdict or suspension reserved to the Apostolic See may not be added by the Ordinary.[52] He may, however, add a vindictive penalty.

Here a little digression may be permitted. It concerns, strictly speaking, can. 898, but also bears upon can. 2247, § 1. We divide the text as follows:

1) Ordinaries shall abstain from reserving to themselves cases which are already reserved under censure to the Holy See.

2) They shall, as a rule, abstain from reserving cases reserved under censure by law. Hither belong the cases reserved by law to the Ordinaries.

3) They shall, as a rule, abstain from reserving cases reserved to no one, but reserved by law.

The first prohibition is unconditional; but the second and third are conditioned by the adverb regulariter. Hence reservations made by and to the Apostolic See should not be made episcopal reservations in any case. But cases reserved by law to the Ordinaries, or reserved to no one, have a phrase attached, viz.: "as a 51 A difficulty arises from can. 2344, § 1, n. 3, where a multiplication of diverse censures decreed or inflicted by distinct superiors is admitted. For alia censura has a wide meaning, embracing diverse kinds as well as things of the same kind (Barbosa, Tractatus Varii, Dictio 26, p. 650 ff.). S. C. EE. et RR., Nov. 26, 1602 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 14) mentions only two excommunications.

52 S. O., July 13, 1916 (l. c.) speaks only of reserved sins, not censures; as is evident from the rubric: "Super casuum conscientiae reservationibus."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

rule." This can mean nothing else than that the bishops should not make it a rule to reserve to themselves cases already reserved to them by law, or reserved to no one by law.

This is the grammatical-verbal interpretation of can. 898. Is there any solid reason to depart from it? We cannot see any such reason. For if it is stated that it is naturally repugnant that bishops should reserve to themselves cases from which they can absolve only by delegated power, the answer is: Concerning the cases reserved to the Apostolic See specialissimo or speciali modo, there might be some shadow of a reason. But as to cases simply reserved to the Apostolic See, or reserved to the bishops by law, or reserved to no one, there cannot be any reason. For in these cases they absolve propriâ auctoritate, granted by law or general faculties. Besides, if the Bishop wishes to impress the faithful with the seriousness of a crime, he may bind himself, or rather shift the odium of the reservation to the Apostolic See. Lastly, it matters little whether he absolves potestate propriâ or delegatâ. It must, however, be observed that the Code strictly enjoins Ordinaries not to make cases reserved to the Apostolic See episcopal cases. This is deducible from the first proposition. But it must be added that invalidity of such reservations cannot be read into the text. The term "abstineant" cannot be stretched that far, nor can the "nequit ferre" of can. 2247, §1 be simply taken as involving invalidity. For the "nequit" alone does not warrant such interpretation. If the legislator had intended invalidity, he would have expressed it, as, for instance, in can. 782, § 3: "valide uti nequeunt."

Legislator quod voluit, expressit; quod noluit, tacuit.

§2 of can. 2247 determines the territorial extent and

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

force of reservation and distinguishes between a reserved censure a iure and one ab homine. Of course it is understood that this law (a iure) affects a diocese or province only, not the Church at large, because the common law binds everywhere. Thus diocesan statutes formerly forbade entering a saloon under suspension, to be incurred ipso facto. This was a censure a iure particulari.

a) The reservation of censures made for a particular territory—by way of a territorial law—is restricted to the limits of the respective territory, diocese or province and has no binding force outside these boundaries, even though the person censured would leave this territory in order to be absolved, in other words, if he would leave his home in fraudem legis.

b) If, however, an Ordinary or judge would inflict a censure and reserve it to himself by virtue of a special ordinance or condemnatory sentence (can. 2217, §1, n. 3), such a reserved censure would bind the person thus censured everywhere, so that he could not be absolved by any confessor unless the latter had obtained special faculties for the purpose. This also concerns religious of exempt institutes. A censure issued in virtue of the law for a whole order or exempt congregation binds in the whole of that order or congregation. If a religious superior issues a special precept or a condemnatory sentence (ab homine), the person thus censured cannot be absolved by another superior, unless the latter has obtained special faculties from the respective superior or the constitutions permit.

However, can. 519 must be considered here. Hence a religious who has incurred a censure decreed as a iure by his institute may be absolved by any approved confessor; but if the censure is ab homine, i. e.,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google incurred by a special precept or condemnatory sentence, he cannot be absolved by any confessor, because can. 519 reads: "a censuris in religione reservatis."

Neither can ignorance of the confessor be a pretext, for §3 of can. 2247 precludes this assumption. It says indeed that if a confessor, unaware of the reservation, absolves a penitent from censure and guilt, the absolution from censure would be valid, but adds: the absolution, even in case of ignorance, would be invalid if given for a censure ab homine or for a censure reserved specialissimo modo to the Apostolic See. What kind of ignorance, whether culpable or inculpable, is required, is not stated nor does the Code distinguish. Similar to ignorance is inadvertence, and therefore inadvertence also must be admitted as an excuse and the absolution be regarded as valid. [53]

The phrase "a censura ac peccato" should be compared with can. 2246, § 3, where it is stated that absolution from censure implies cessation of reservation of sin, provided the censure is not one which prevents the reception of the Sacraments.

Take can. 894, the false accusation of an innocent priest. This is a case reserved as a sin, or by the very nature of the offence, and, besides, it is reserved to the Apostolic See speciali modo, under censure, in virtue of can. 2363. The question arises whether the confessor, not knowing of, or not adverting to, the reservation when he absolves the penitent from "censure," also absolves him from the sin, so that the penitent can receive the Sacraments. A different answer is given by different authors. Under can. 894 we maintained that "neither ignorance nor doubt as to 53 Cfr. Cappello, l. c., p. 25. See, for instance, can. 2338, § 1, which supposes a dolus, according to can. 2229, § 2, i. e., full knowledge and deliberation.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the law of reservation excuses from this reservation." This view is shared by others, e. g., Ayrinhac (Penal Legislation, p. 310 ff.), but it is contradicted by Arregui (Summarium Theol. Moralis, 4th ed., no. 607), although his argumentation did not convince us. However, since can. 209 admits a probable and positive doubt as to the "supplet ecclesia," it is but meet that we should here supplement what we said under can. 894 (Vol. IV, p. 318), to the effect that the absolution from sin in this case (Can. 894) should be considered valid and licit.

The censure reserved modo speciali to the Apostolic See may be validly removed if the confessor does not know or is not aware of it. If the sin is not reserved ratione sui, for its own sake, but only as far as a censure is attached to it, absolution from censure also involves absolution from sin. For instance, if an apostate religious who has incurred excommunication reserved to the Ordinary (or religious superior, can. 2385), goes to a confessor who does not know of that reservation and absolves from both censure and sin, the penitent is absolved from both. For the text simply says: "ignorans reservationem" without qualification, and thus appears to admit ignorance of reservation of both censure and sin, and therefore no distinction need be made as to censures preventing and censures not preventing the reception of the Sacraments. This should also be applied to episcopal cases.

ABSOLUTION FROM CENSURES

It was said elsewhere that the bishops were formerly wont to send penitents guilty of enormous crimes to Rome, to present themselves to the Sovereign Pontiff in order to receive a penance or to ask for the benefit of a change or absolution. Personal appearance before the higher court was then required, as also absolution, i. e., a formal decision. For although the purpose of a censure is to amend the delinquent, yet, since the infliction of such a penalty implies an act of jurisdiction, more generally in the external forum, it is a logical consequence that the removal of such a juridical-moral tie requires an act of jurisdiction. Hence no one, even though perfectly contrite and willing to reform, can promise himself freedom from censures incurred, unless he has a warrant from the ecclesiastical court. But since the salvation of souls is the supreme law of the Church, it follows that the external régime may be relaxed or modified in cases of imperative need or greater spiritual progress for the benefit of the cura animarum. Such, in brief, is the development of the penitential discipline as related to censures. Personal appearance is no longer required and the burden of being subject to censures for a space of time that would prove intolerable or dangerous to the spiritual welfare of man has been relieved. At the same time the seriousness of censures has been preserved and the heinousness of the more atrocious crimes is still brought home to recusants.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

NECESSITY OF AND CLAIM TO ABSOLUTION—REVIVAL OF CENSURES

Can. 2248

§1. Quaelibet censura, semel contracta, tollitur tantum legitima absolutione.

§2. Absolutio denegari nequit cum primum delinquens a contumacia recesserit ad normam can. 2242, §3; a censura autem absolvens, potest, si res ferat, pro

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

patrato delicto congruam vindicativam poenam vel poenitentiam infligere.

§3. Censura, per absolutionem sublata, non reviviscit, nisi in casu quo onus impositum sub poena reincidentiae impletum non fuerit.

1. Necessity. That a censure once contracted can be removed only by a lawful absolution, follows from the definition given in can. 2236, §1. There is, then, no other way of obtaining relief except by absolution, leaving the rest to God and the disposition of the individual.[54] Absolution is legitima if imparted by competent authority. Competent is the one who has inflicted the censure, or his superior, delegate, or successor (can. 2245, §2).

The text furthermore says: "semel contracta." A censure may be threatened by a special ordinance of the superior, as it were conditionally: "If you violate this ordinance, then etc." Such precepts cease for particular individuals with the cessation of the authority who issued them, unless indeed they were formulated in a legitimate document or given in the presence of two witnesses.[55] If the censure was not yet incurred when the superior who issued the precept goes out of office, it ceases and therefore no special authority is needed for absolution.

2. Claim to Absolution. As stated, the purpose of censures is the amendment of the delinquent. Consequently, if he recedes from contumacy or persistent disobedience, he is entitled to absolution and it cannot be licitly withheld from him.

Repentance alone, however, is not sufficient for purging oneself of contumacy, but satisfaction and reparation of scandal are required, according to can. 2242, §3. Hence 54 Cfr. c. 1, X, V, 41. 55 See can. 24.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the one who absolves from censure must judge whether the acts performed by the penitent are sufficient. Besides, he may also impose a vindictive penalty, or penance, proportionate to the crime committed, should the case require this.

But what if the party who was offended by the criminal act would refuse to make peace or consider the satisfaction insufficient? This would not interfere with the absolution, and the latter should not, therefore, be withheld, if the delinquent has performed the works prescribed.[56]

The imposition of such a vindictive penance is left to the one who absolves from censures, and he should judge the case or situation objectively. If the one absolved should fail to comply with his obligation of assuming a vindictive penance, the absolution would nevertheless be valid.

3. Revival of censures. A censure duly removed never revives. This is the rule. However, the absolvens may impose a work, vindictive penalty or penance, retraction, restitution, petition for absolution or any kind of work under penalty of relapse into the censure if the imposed penance is not complied with. This is called absolutio sub poena reincidentiae. It is a conditional absolution, which, while it hic et nunc completely removes the censure and its effects, eventually depends on the fulfillment of the condition by the person who was thus absolved.

Hence, if the condition is complied with, the censure

[56] S. C. EE. et RR., Aug. 4, 1579 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 225). One had committed a violent act against a priest, who was not satisfied with the reparation made. But the delinquent had done everything prescribed in the rescript of absolution and therefore the bishop was told to absolve him. See also Reg. Iuris 4. et 5. in 6°.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

remains removed; but if it is not fulfilled, the censure returns (reviviscit). Whether a new guilt is incurred, is a controverted question. However, there can be no doubt that a new and culpable contumacy is required, since the censure has been taken away completely, and every censure requires contumacy. It may be said, therefore, that the old sentence revives with the same censure if the contumacy is verified in the second instance.[57] The reason why the censure revives is the protection of authority.[58]

The clause of reincidence must, of course, be expressly stated in law, as is the case in can. 2252, 2254, §§1, 3, or by the one who inflicts or absolves from censure.

ABSOLUTION FROM SEVERAL CENSURES

Can. 2249

§1. Si quis pluribus censuris detineatur, potest ab una absolvi, ceteris minime absolutis.

§2. Petens absolutionem, debet casus omnes indicare, secus absolutio valet tantum pro casu expresso; quod si absolutio, quamvis particularis petitio facta sit, fuerit generalis, valet quoque pro reticitis bona fide, excepta censura specialissimo modo Sedi Apostolicae reservata, non autem pro reticitis mala fide.

A censure may be incurred for various reasons and crimes, and it may be inflicted by different superiors. Although one mortal sin cannot be remitted without the 57 Cfr. Ballerini-Palmieri., Opus Theol. Morale, VII, n. 289; ed. 2, p. 146 ff. Different from this conditional absolution is the provisional (absolutio ad cautelam) which is sometimes given to receive a favor or for a certain time, and produces a limited effect; ib., n. 291.

58 See c. 22, 6° V, 11: "nec sic illudant censurae ecclesiasticae."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

other mortal sins weighing upon the soul, yet one censure may be removed without the others being taken away. This is to be explained according to can. 2244, being evident from the diverse effects which diverse censures may produce, especially since censures are intended more for the public welfare of Christian society than for the court of conscience.

Hence it is, as §2 of can. 2249 rules, that one who has incurred several censures, when asking for absolution, must mention all the censures he has incurred; otherwise the absolution will be good only for the censure expressed in the petition. The reason for this rule lies in the above-mentioned fact of the possibility of several censures being inflicted for various crimes and reasons by various superiors. Therefore even the power, not only the will, may be wanting in the one who absolves.

The second clause of this section reads: If, however, absolution was imparted in general terms, even though the censured person had asked to be absolved from one particular censure, the absolution holds good for all censures which were concealed in good faith. But this general absolution is not valid in case of censures reserved specialissimo modo to the Apostolic See, nor is it valid for censures concealed in bad faith.

This law contains both a positive and a negative assertion. It admits absolution for censures bona fide reticitis, or as they are sometimes called, oblitis, i. e., censures which the penitent forgot to mention either in confession or in his petition.

The first supposition, of course, is that the one who is asked for absolution has the power, either ordinary or delegated, of absolving from the censures in question.

The second supposition is that the penitent has bona fide

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

omitted to mention some censures incurred by him, whether reserved or not. Here the whole question turns about the will of the superior to absolve from censures which were not mentioned. The Code says implicitly that this will must be presumed if he uses a formula indicating general absolution, as is the case in the formula "in quantum possum et tu indiges." Hence, if the tenor or wording of the absolution was general, the absolution frees the penitent from all censures, including those he omitted to mention.[59]

The negative clause is restrictive and, first, excludes from the absolution in general terms the four censures most specially reserved to the Pope. Secondly, it denies the benefit of absolution from censures that have been concealed purposely or mala fide. One reason for this is that it depends on the will of the superior, who is not supposed to coöperate with sinful and deliberate deception, as his power is not for destruction, but for edification. Another reason is to safeguard the dignity of censures.

Quite different from this question is that of an invalid confession, in which the censures were either mentioned or bona fide omitted. This question is not solved by our text.[60]

ABSOLUTION FROM SIN AND CENSURE

Can. 2250

§1. Si agatur de censura quae non impedit Sacramentorum receptionem, censuratus, rite dispositus et 59 Ballerini-Palmieri, l. c., Vol. V, n. 753, p. 414 ff.

60 The more probable opinion admits the validity of the absolution from censures confessed in an invalid confession; Ballerini-Palmieri, l. c., Vol. V, n. 760, p. 417.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

a contumacia recedens, potest absolvi a peccatis, firma censura.

§2. Si vero agatur de censura quae impedit Sacramentorum receptionem, censuratus nequit absolvi a peccatis, nisi prius a censura absolutus fuerit.

§3. Absolutio censurae in foro sacramentali continetur in consueta forma absolutionis peccatorum in libris ritualibus praescripta; in foro non sacramentali quolibet modo dari potest, sed ad excommunicationis absolutionem regulariter formam adhiberi convenit in eisdem libris traditam.

Since the administration of the Sacraments and their efficacy depend solely on the will and institution of Christ, whereas absolution from censures depends on the will of man, i. e., the superior or positive law, it follows that absolution from sin and absolution from censures are two different acts, even though they may be performed by means of the same formula.

1. Hence one may be absolved from sin, and therefore be in the state of grace, yet remain under censure. This is admitted by the text in case of a censure which does not prevent the censured from receiving the Sacraments, provided the penitent is properly disposed for receiving the Sacrament of Penance and gives up his contumacy, according to can. 2242, §3. Thus one placed under suspension, local interdict or interdict ab ingressu ecclesiae (can. 2276) may validly and licitly be absolved from sin, and yet remain suspended or interdicted. Of course, if the censure entailed a prohibition of saying Mass, he could not licitly perform this function.

2. If, on the other hand, there is question of a censure which prevents the reception of the Sacraments, absolution

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

from censure must be imparted before absolution from sin can licitly [61] be granted. This is the case with excommunication. The reason for this distinction lies in the separable effects of the respective censures as well as in the will of the lawgiver; see also can. 2247, §3.

3. Formula of Absolution. The text distinguishes two fora, the sacramental and the non-sacramental. The latter is again distinguished according to the kind of censures involved. Hence:

a) If absolution is given in the tribunal of penance (in foro sacramentali), the usual form contained in the Roman Ritual [62] should be employed.

b) In the non-sacramental forum (in foro non-sacramentali), either for the court of conscience or for the external forum, any formula may be used if no excommunication is implied; hence also the short formula for the confessional is permitted.

c) If, however, absolution is to be given from excommunication, the formula prescribed in the Roman Ritual (or Pontifical) should, as a rule, be employed.[63] Regulariter, therefore, admits a departure from the general rule, and in urgent cases the confessional or even the abbreviated formula may be used.

There is also in the Ritual [64] a formula for absolving a person who has been under excommunication, but has given signs of repentance before dying. The purpose of this absolution, as is evident from the same Ritual, con-

61 The text does not call for invalidity; Cappello, l. c., p. 28.

62 Tit. III, c. 2 (ed. Pustet, 1913, p. 66 f.). "Misereatur tui. . . . Indulgentiam. . . . Dominus noster. . . . Passio. . . ." In urgent cases: "Ego te absolvo ab omnibus censuris et peccatis in nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti." 63 Ibid., tit. III, c. 3 (ed. cit., p. 68 ff.).

64 Tit. III, c. 4, where verberare corpus means to touch the body or coffin with the (penitential) rod, which is a reminder of the virga of I Cor. IV, 21.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sists in permitting ecclesiastical burial. Absolution from censures may be imparted validly in any form, written or oral, nor is it required that the party be personally present; even absent and unwilling persons may be absolved.[65]

ABSOLUTION IN THE EXTERNAL AND INTERNAL FORUM

Can. 2251

Si absolutio censurae detur in foro externo, utrumque forum afficit: si in interno, absolutus, remoto scandalo, potest uti talem se habere etiam in actibus fori externi; sed, nisi concessio absolutionis probetur aut saltem legitime praesumatur in foro externo, censura potest a Superioribus fori externi, quibus reus parere debet, urgeri, donec absolutio in eodem foro habita fuerit.

The formula of absolution, although distinct as to the two fora (sacramental and non-sacramental), does not touch the effects of absolution in either. But the case is different when we say that absolution was given in the external forum, and when we say it was imparted in the internal forum, either in the Sacrament of Penance or outside this Sacrament, but for the court of conscience. The reason for this distinction lies in the effects and the purpose of censures, which concern the public welfare of the Church, the avenging of crime, and the reparation of scandal or damage. This can more efficaciously be obtained and urged if the absolution given in foro interno is not admitted as sufficient in the external forum.[65] But [65] Capello, p. 29. Laymann, Theol. Moral., I, tract, 5, P. I, c. 7. P. 6 (ed Venet., 1690, Vol. I, p. 91).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

our text is very cautiously worded and avoids any insinuation as to the validity of an absolution given in the internal forum which would properly require an absolution for the external forum. Take, for instance, can. 2319, §1, n. 1. A marriage contracted before a non-Catholic minister is no doubt a notorious or public crime, entailing excommunication reserved to the Ordinary. Therefore the pastor or curate who has received from the Ordinary the faculty to absolve the guilty party, should give the absolution in foro externo in order to make sure of its validity.[66]

The text says:

1.° Absolution given in foro externo affects both fora, the internal as well as the external; concerning this there never was a doubt.[67]

2.° If the absolution was given in foro interno, the person thus absolved may conduct himself as one absolved or freed from censure also concerning acts of the external forum, provided the scandal has been removed.

Returning to our case (can. 2319), a priest endowed with the proper faculties may impart absolution in foro interno, i. e., either in the Sacrament of Penance or outside of it. If the couple is unknown in the place of absolution, there will be no scandal; but there might be if they were well known and would stay away from the Sacraments. Consequently, the parties may go to the Sacraments and perform other legal ecclesiastical acts, even if they were absolved only in foro interno, or, as we say, privately.

3.° However, continues the text, if absolution was given

66 And since it is an excommunication, the formula propria should be used according to Rit. Rom., tit. III, c. 3.

67 S. Poenit., April 27, 1886, ad 4 (Coll. P. F., n. 1655).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google privately only, the superiors of the external forum, before whom the censured person is bound to appear, may insist upon the censure until absolution is given in the external forum, unless evidence is furnished that absolution was granted, or may be lawfully presumed, for the external forum.

Notice (a) that the text does not imply invalidity [68] of the absolution given privately, provided of course the power or faculty was not wanting; (b) that the superior enjoying jurisdiction in foro externo is not obliged to urge the censure unconditionally, but only under the condition (c) that evidence is wanting or presumption. Evidence may be had from the certificate of absolution or through an official document issued by the one who absolved in foro interno. Presumption or circumstantial evidence would be the giving of satisfaction, also witnesses who had seen the party go to confession or heard of it.[69]

Urgere censuram means to demand that the parties conduct themselves as censured, and therefore abstain from performing any and all acts forbidden by the censure. The Ordinary is entitled to urge the censure in the case of can. 2319 and of can. 2314, §2. In cases of occult censures, if neither scandal nor promulgation or denunciation are involved, absolution given in the internal forum would certainly be sufficient.[70]

Regulars cannot absolve penitents from censures for the external forum, and those whom they do absolve, if denounced by the Ordinaries, must conduct themselves

68 Missionaries could absolve apostates and heretics only in foro conscientiae, and those thus absolved had to present themselves before the Holy Office or the Ordinary, "si velint esse tuti in foro exteriori"; S. O., Jan. 3, 1640; Sept. 28, 1672 (Coll. P. F., nn. 98, 204).

69 Ballerini-Palmieri, l. c., VII, n. 320, p. 162.

70 Laymann, l. c.; see can. 2237, § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

as censured.[71] The reason is substantially the same: the bishop is entitled to have a guarantee of absolution and satisfaction, especially if the censure was publicly declared or is likely to cause a juridical investigation;[72]— in other words, if it should become notorious.

THOSE EMPOWERED TO ABSOLVE FROM CENSURES

The following three canons point out three distinct classes of cases. The first treats of the danger in which any priest may absolve; the second outlines the regular administration under normal conditions, and the last provides for urgent and special situations. They show how the Church adapts her laws to the exigencies of the times.

I. ABSOLUTION IN DANGER OF DEATH

Can. 2252

Qui in periculo mortis constituti, a sacerdote, specialis facultatis experte, receperunt absolutionem ab aliqua censura ab homine vel a censura specialissimo modo Sedi Apostolicae reservata, tenentur, postquam convaluerint, obligatione recurrendi, sub poena reincidentiae, ad illum qui censuram tulit, si agatur de censura ab homine; ad S. Poenitentiariam vel ad Episcopum aliumve facultate praeditum, ad normam can. 2254, §1, si de censura a iure; eorumque mandatis parendi.

The Decretals[73] demanded, as a rule, personal 71 Clement X, "Superna," June 21, 1670, § 7.

72 S. C. P. F., Jan. 14, 1726 (Coll., n. 305).

73 Cfr. cc. 3, 26, 58, X, V, 39. C. 22, 6°, V, 11.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

appearance before the "Apostolic Lord" to receive his order in case of a reserved censure. At the same time they admitted exceptions in the cases of women, old or sickly persons, and especially in cases where there was danger of death. But in this latter instance the obligation of a personal visit to Rome remained, as soon as the patient recovered sufficiently, under pain of falling back into censure.[74] The Friars Preachers and Friars Minor had obtained the faculty to absolve from censures in case of impending death, but under the same conditions. Every reservation ceased after the Council of Trent, whose ruling has passed into the Code.[74a] Hence any validly ordained priest, no matter what his juridical or moral standing, may absolve in danger of death from any sin or censure.

Our text also supposes that a special faculty required for absolving from reserved censures is wanting in the priest who otherwise may enjoy ordinary jurisdiction in foro poenitentiae, and says:

1°. When in danger of death[75] one may be absolved by any priest, even though the priest has no jurisdiction or faculties to absolve from the censure in question; but

2°. After recovery, i. e., after being fully restored to health, the penitent is bound to have recourse to the proper authority, under penalty of falling back into the censure

3°. If absolution has been given from a censure reserved ab homine, or modo specialissimo reserved to the Apostolic 74 C. I, Extrav. Comm., V, 7 (Bened. XI, A. D. 1304). 74a Sess. 4, c. 7, de Poenit., can. 882.

75 When the Archbishop of Cincinnati asked when the penitents could be said to be in danger or in articulo (at the point) of death the Holy Office referred him to approved authors; S. O., Sept. 13, 1859, ad 1 (Coll. P. F., n. 1181). As a rule, the danger of death may be supposed when the penitent is in such a state that he has an equal chance for life or death, be the danger internal, (sickness, wounds, birth, old age) or external (war, perilous journey); Cappello, l. c., p. 33.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

See, recourse must be had to the one who inflicted the censure, if it was a censure ab homine. The recourse must be had to the S. Poenitentiaria, or to the bishop, or to another endowed with the faculty of absolving, if the censure was one a iure, i. e., specialissimo modo reserved to the Holy See.

4°. This recourse implies that the penitent abide by the order of the respective superiors. The term "mandatis parendi" implies willingness and promptness to carry out the injunctions given, either orally or in writing. Generally there is attached to the rescript of absolution the clause: "iniunctis de iure iniungendis." This signifies:

(a) that the censured party must give satisfaction to those who were hurt or damaged by the criminal act for which he or she was censured;

(b) that scandal be repaired if any was given;

(c) that other imposed works, such as sacramental confession or penance, be accepted.[76]

Note that only the four cases reserved specialissimo modo (i. e., a iure) require recourse under penalty of reincidence. All other censures reserved a iure to the Apostolic See, either simplici or speciali modo, as well as the cases reserved by law to the Ordinary, do not call for such recourse.

The text alludes to the bishop or other priest, aliumve facultate praeditum. Ordinaries, therefore, also need faculties to receive such a recourse and to impart absolution in the four cases mentioned.[77]

76 Cappello, l. c., p. 80. The term "standi mandatis ecclesiae" has been explained as the obligation of having recourse, either personally or through the confessor, to the Roman Pontiff; S. O., Aug. 19, 1891; March 30, 1892 (Coll. P. F., nn. 1764, 1788). This is expressed in the text.

77 The faculties issued May 6, 1919, for the nuncios, internuncios, and Apostolic delegates do not

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

In can. 2254, §1, the rule is laid down that recourse should be made by letter or through the confessor. It also indicates the time within which recourse must be made, i. e., a month from recovery.

2. ABSOLUTION WHEN THERE IS NO DANGER OF DEATH

Can. 2253

Extra mortis periculum possunt absolvere:

1.° A censura non reservata, in foro sacramentali quilibet confessarius; extra forum sacramentale quicunque iurisdictionem in foro externo habeat in reum;

2.° A censura ab homine, ille, cui censura reservata est ad norman can. 2245, §2; ipse autem potest absolutionem concedere, etiamsi reus alio domicilium vel quasi-domicilium transtulerit;

3.° A censura a iure reservata, ille qui censuram constituit vel cui reservata est, eorumque successores aut competentes Superiores aut delegati. Quare a censura reservata Episcopo vel Ordinario, quilibet Ordinarius absolvere potest suos subditos, loci vero Ordinarius etiam peregrinos; a reservata Sedi Apostolicae, haec aliive qui absolvendi potestatem ab ea impetraverint sive generalem, si censura simpliciter reservata sit, sive specialem, si reservata speciali modo, sive denique specialissimam, si reservata specialissimo modo, salvo praescripto can. 2254.

This canon regulates the ordinary administration, under normal conditions, of the penitential jurisdiction in the internal and external forum with regard to censures. It contain this power; nor do those issued in 1920 to the Vicar-Apostolic of North Carolina.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

is the rule, whenever danger of death or urgent cases do not justify a departure.

1. As to non-reserved censures. From these every duly approved confessor may validly and licitly absolve in the tribunal of penance for the internal as well as the external forum; but for the latter, absolution holds good only under the condition laid down in can. 2251. If absolution is to be given outside the confessional, it must be imparted by the one who has jurisdiction over the delinquent in foro externo. Therefore, a pastor or curate cannot absolve from non-reserved censures outside the confessional, unless he has received delegated power to do so from his bishop.

This absolution given in foro externo also affects the court of conscience (can. 2251).

2. As to reserved censures ab homine. From these only he who has inflicted the censure, or his competent superior, or his successor or delegate, can absolve, as stated under can. 2245, §5. However, he who is entitled to impart absolution may grant it also in a strange territory, i. e., even though the delinquent has set up his domicile or quasi-domicile elsewhere. This is according to the forum delicti, as stated in can. 1566.

3. To absolve from censures reserved a iure the competency is first determined according to the general principle: "he can loose who can bind," i. e., he who set up the law enacting the censures can absolve from it.[78] But the supreme lawgiver reserves certain censures to the Ordinaries and to exempt religious superiors.

Therefore two points are to be observed: the lawgiver as far as he has enacted the censure as law, and the reservation. The general principle is that the successors of the lawgiver or those to whom the censures are re-

[78] See cc. 29, 39, X, V, 39.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

served, the competent superiors of these, and, finally, the delegates of either, may absolve.[79] These authorities are specially mentioned.

a) An Ordinary may absolve his subjects everywhere from censures reserved Episcopo or Ordinario; the local Ordinary may absolve also peregrini.

By Ordinaries must be understood

1.° All bishops, also titular bishops, who enjoy the privilege of choosing for themselves any confessor, and also their dependents, who by this very choice obtain jurisdiction to absolve from censures reserved to the Ordinary.[80]

2.° Abbots or prelates nullius who enjoy the same power, with the exception of the privilege just mentioned (can. 349), unless they are bishops.

3.° Vicars-general, vicars-capitular (administrators), vicars and prefects Apostolic.

4.° The major superiors of exempt clerical religious orders may either personally or through a delegate absolve their own subjects [81] from every censure iure reserved to the Ordinary.

The Ordinaries mentioned under n. 1 to 4, with the sole exception of titular bishops, may also absolve their subjects from occult censures reserved simplici modo to the Holy See.

Finally Cardinals enjoy the privilege of absolving from any censure, except the four specialissimo modo reserved to the Pope.[82]

79 Delegatus is referred to both superiors and successors and implicitly to the delegate of the lawgiver or reservans by law.

80 See can. 349, § 1, n. 1 as compared with can. 239, § 1, n. 2; but this is a personal privilege, not communicable to others, except as far as the canon permits.

81 A prelate cannot absolve one who is not his subject by reason of profession or obedience, unless the approved Constitutions give him that right.

82 Can. 239, § 1, n. 1 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

It goes without saying that the Sovereign Pontiff may, either himself or through his delegates, absolve from any censure reserved either a iure or ab homine.

b) Only the Apostolic See itself can de iure absolve from censures reserved to the Apostolic See; every inferior needs faculties, which are of a threefold kind:

1.° A special faculty is required for absolving from censures which are reserved to the Apostolic See simplici modo.

2.° A special faculty is required to absolve from censures reserved to the Apostolic See modo speciali.[83]

3.° A most special faculty is needed to absolve from the four cases reserved to the Apostolic See modo specialissimo.

3. ABSOLUTION IN MORE URGENT CASES

Can. 2254

§1. In casibus urgentioribus, si nempe censurae latae sententiae exterius servari nequeant sine periculo gravis scandali vel infamiae, aut si durum sit poenitenti in statu gravis peccati permanere per tempus necessarium ut Superior competens provideat, tunc quilibet confessarius in foro sacramentali ab eisdem, quoquo modo reservatis, absolvere potest, iniuncto onere recurrendi, sub poena reincidentiae, intra mensem saltem per epistolam et per confessarium, si id fieri possit sine gravi incommodo, reticito nomine, ad S. Poenitentiariam vel ad Episcopum

83 An Apostolic Delegate has the general and special, but not the most special, faculty; see Faculties, May 19, 1919, n. 4; Prelates regular, after the Constitution "Apostolicae Sedis," 1869, could no longer—nor can they now—absolve from cases simpliciter reserved to the Apostolic See; S. Poenit., Dec. 5, 1873 (Coll. P. F., n. 1409).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

aliumve Superiorem praeditum facultate et standi eius mandatis.

§2. Nihil impedit quominus poenitens, etiam post acceptam, ut supra, absolutionem, facto quoque recursu ad Superiorem, alium adeat confessarium facultate praeditum, ab eoque, repetita confessione saltem delicti cum censura, consequatur absolutionem; qua obtenta, mandata ab eodem accipiat, quin teneatur postea stare aliis mandatis ex parte Superioris supervenientibus.

§3. Quod si in casu aliquo extraordinario hic recursus sit moraliter impossibilis, tunc ipsemet confessarius, excepto casu quo agatur de absolutione censurae de qua in can. 2367, potest absolutionem concedere sine onere de quo supra, iniunctis tamen de iure iniungendis, et imposita congrua poenitentia et satisfactione pro censura, ita ut poenitens, nisi intra congruum tempus a confessario praefiniendum poenitentiam egerit ac satisfactionem dederit, recidat in censuram.

Although the Decretals allude to legitimate impediments preventing a personal appearance in Rome, the case, as it is now formulated, is rather modern.[84] Besides the aforesaid Decretals demanded a sworn guarantee (debita cautio sub iuramento) before one could be absolved by a bishop or a simple priest. This more especially when the privilegium canonis had been violated.

The first section of can. 2254 states and circumscribes the case, §2 modifies it, and §3 mitigates the requirement of recourse.

1. In more urgent cases any duly approved confessor

84 See cc. 29, 58, X, V, 39; c. 22, 6°, V, 11; S. O., June 23, 1886, (Coll. P. F., n. 1658): "In casibus vere urgentioribus, in quibus. . . ."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

may validly and licitly absolve from each and every censure, no matter how and to whom it is reserved, provided it is a censure latae sententiae.

Which cases are more urgent, is then stated as follows:

a) When these censures cannot be exteriorly observed without serious danger of scandal or loss of reputation, which may be the case if a priest would be obliged to exercise the sacred ministry, or if a layman in good standing would have to omit his Easter Communion; to judge whether this case is verified belongs to the confessor.[85]

b) Or if it would be difficult for the penitent to remain in the state of grievous sin for the length of time required to obtain the necessary faculty from the competent superior.[86] Whether and under what circumstances it would be difficult for a penitent to remain in this state, must be left to the judgment of the confessor, who certainly may apply the rule: "Poenitenti credendum est." Therefore, if the penitent should say, one day would be hard, we think our canon could be applied, though some authors hold that at least a week, or three or four days, are required.[87]

The obligation of the confessor under such circumstances is:

a) That he absolve[88] in the tribunal of penance; hence he cannot absolve outside the confessional, because the forum sacramentale is not identical with the internal forum;

85 S. O., June 23, 1886, ad 2° (Coll., n. 1658).

86 This reason is an enlargement of the former; S. O., June 16, 1897 (Coll., n. 1971).

87 See Cappello, l. c., p. 34. Frequent Communion should now-a-days also be reckoned with.

88 The absolution is a direct one, i. e., one which remits the sin by virtue of the judicial (penitential) sentence given for that sin (under censure); S. O., Aug. 19, 1891, ad 3; March 30, 1892, ad 6 (Coll. P. F., nn. 1764, 1788); Arregui, l. c., p. 394.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

b) That he impose on the penitent the strict and grievous obligation of having recourse to the S. Poenitentiaria, or to a bishop or other superior endowed with the necessary faculties to absolve him, and to abide by their orders;

c) That this recourse be imposed under penalty of reincidence (sub poena reincidentiae),[89] i. e., of falling back into specifically the same censure from which he is now absolved;

d) To remind the penitent that recourse must be had within a month, to be reckoned probably from the day of absolution, or at least from the day when he became conscious of the obligation;

e) To tell the penitent that the recourse may be made by letter, in which case the proper names are to be entirely suppressed and fictitious names used, or personally, because a personal visit to Rome is not excluded;

f) For the confessor to remember that he, too, is bound to have recourse to the competent authority, unless a serious obstacle prevents him.

Here we may add two decisions of the S. Poenitentiaria.[90]

1.° That the recourse cannot be spared the penitent, even if the post-office authorities or civil power should open the letter, because fictitious names are given.

2.° If the penitent is a transient, whom the confessor may not meet again, it suffices that a serious promise be demanded of him to have recourse to the competent

89 This reincidence concerns censures reserved to the Apostolic See modo simplici, and consequently also those reserved speciali and specialissimo modo; S. O., June 17, 1891, ad 2 (Coll., n. 1756).

90 S. Poenit., Nov. 7, 1888 (Coll. P. F., n. 1695, ad. 5 et 6). The month is, of course, to be understood as the minimum, or, as we say, ad urgendam, not ad finiendam, obligationem.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google authorities. In this case, we incline to believe, the burden of writing should not be urged against the confessor.

§2 says the penitent is at liberty to approach another confessor endowed with the necessary faculties and to obtain absolution from him. This right is granted even in case the penitent has already been absolved (in urgent necessity) and has had recourse to the competent authority. But the penitent has again to confess the censured sin to this other confessor, in order that the latter may know the nature of the case and impose the necessary injunctions. After that absolution the penitent has merely to carry out the orders given by the second confessor and is not bound to abide by the injunctions of the superior to whom recourse was had, which may reach him later.

§3 modifies the requirement of recourse. If in some extraordinary case, it says, recourse should be morally impossible, the confessor may grant absolution without imposing the obligation of recourse. However, in that case another obligation must be imposed, viz., iniunctis de iure iniungendis, and a proportionate penance and satisfaction for the censure. This obligation is so grave that if the penitent would not comply with the penance imposed and with the demand of satisfaction within the time fixed by the confessor, he would fall back into the same censure.

Recourse would be morally impossible, as the Holy Office has declared, if neither the penitent nor the confessor could write, and it would be hard for the penitent to approach another confessor; or if the penitent himself was unable to write, though the confessor was, but the latter would not be likely to meet the penitent again, in order to give him the answer.[91]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

From this favor of omitting the recourse is excluded the case of absolutio complicis (can. 2367); and poverty or inconvenience to seek another confessor are not admitted as an excuse.[92]

91 S. O., Nov. 9, 1898; Sept. 5, 1900 (Coll., nn. 2023, 2095).

92 S. O., June 7, 1899 (Coll., n. 2052).

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

CENSURES IN PARTICULAR

Can. 2255

§1. Censurae sunt:

1.° Excommunicatio;

2.° Interdictum;

3.° Suspensio.

§2. Excommunicatio afficere potest tantum personas physicas, et ideo, si quando feratur in corpus morale, intelligitur singulos afficere qui in delictum concurrerint; interdictum et suspensio, etiam communitatem, ut personam moralem; excommunicatio et interdictum, etiam laicos; suspensio, clericos tantum; interdictum, etiam locum; excommunicatio est semper censura; interdictum et suspensio possunt esse vel censurae vel poenae vindicativae, sed in dubio praesumuntur censurae.

Can. 2256

In canonibus qui sequuntur:

1.° Nomine divinorum officiorum intelliguntur functiones potestatis ordinis, quae de instituto Christi vel Ecclesiae ad divinum cultum ordinantur et a solis clericis fieri queunt;

2.° Nomine autem actuum legitimorum ecclesiasticorum significantur: munus administratoris gerere bonorum ecclesiasticorum; partes agere iudicis,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

auditoris et relatoris, defensoris vinculi, promotoris iustitiae et fidei, notarii et cancellarii, cursoris et apparitoris, advocati et procuratoris in causis ecclesiasticis; munus patrini agere in sacramentis baptismi et confirmationis; suffragium ferre in electionibus ecclesiasticis; ius patronatus exercere.

These two canons enumerate the censures, then state on whom and how they may be inflicted, and, lastly, set forth the significance of certain terms connected with the effects of censures.

I. There are three kinds of censures:

1. Excommunication,
2. Interdict,
3. Suspension.

This enumeration is complete and has never varied since the time of the Decretals.[1] Consequently, irregularity arising from crime (ex delicto) is no censure, although some have asserted it, as Benedict XIV says.[2]

II. §2 of can. 2255 determines the subject on whom censures may be inflicted, distinguishing between physical and moral or artificial persons, laymen and clergymen, persons and places.

a) Excommunication can affect only single individuals. Therefore, if this censure is inflicted on a corporation, the meaning can only be that the members of that corporation, as far as they are guilty of, or partakers in, the censured crime, are intended.

b) The interdict and suspension may be inflicted also on a community as such, i. e., a corporation. The difference between excommunication and the interdict,

1 See c. 20, X, V, 40; c. 1, 6°, V, 11.

2 "Inter Praeteritos," Dec. 3, 1749, § 48.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

as affecting or not affecting a corporation, lies in the respective effects. The effects of excommunication concern personal spiritual benefits and favors, i. e., such as touch the soul and salvation of the individual, whereas the privation entailed by suspension or interdict is not of an individual spiritual character.[3] Hence excommunication can be inflicted only on real delinquents, although they may otherwise be punished as members of the corporation; for it is not necessary that each and every person be nominally censured (can. 2242, §1). If some authors go further and say that a corporation is not capable of being excommunicated because it forms a fictitious, not a real body, and has no soul (or rather will) in common,[4] they shoot beyond the mark. For a corporation has a collective will, and is capable of rights and obligations quite different from the rights and obligations inherent in its members as private citizens or non-members.[5] We need not stretch the imagination to comprehend a corporate will. It is the will of the community as expressed by its statutes and asserted by its lawful representatives. The fictio iuris is therefore quite superfluous; for since corporations are endowed with rights and obligations of their own, it is but logical that they should also be liable to punishment. This idea is not precisely embodied in the Roman, English or American law of old, but it prevails in modern times.[6] On the other hand, if a collective will were denied

3 Cfr. Suarez, De Cens., disp. 18, sect. 2, n. 3; Laymann, Theol. Moral., l. I, tr. V, p. II, c. 1, n. 6.

4 Thus Suarez, I. c., c. 5. 6°, V, 11 insinuates the real reason: "volentes animarum periculum vitare, quod exinde sequi posset, cum nonnunquam contingeret innoxios huiusmodi sententia irretire."

5 Wernz, Ius Decret., VI, p. 24, n. 18.

6 Kenny-Webb, Outlines of Criminal Law, 1907, p. 57 ff.; of course, the criminal liability of a corporation has its limits; for a corporation cannot be hanged, though it can be fined.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to a corporation, it is hardly conceivable that it could be interdicted or suspended. Hence we said that those who use this argument "shoot beyond the mark." Consequently, the real and practical difference between excommunication not affecting a community as such on the one side, and interdict and suspension as affecting a community as such on the other hand, must be sought in the effects, i. e., in the personal privation of intrinsically spiritual goods which properly concern the salvation of the soul.

c) Excommunication and interdict may be inflicted also on the laity, whilst suspension is for the clergy only.

d) An interdict may be laid on a place, not, of course, by reason of guilt or punishment in the proper sense, but as the container of culpable subjects or connected with an indictable crime.

e) Excommunication is always a censure, whereas interdict and suspension may be either censures or vindictive penalties; if it is doubtful whether they were inflicted as a censure or as a vindictive penalty, they are presumed to be censures. Thus an interdict or suspension in perpetuum or ad tempus praefinitum, or ad beneplacitum superioris (can. 2291, n. 1 f.; 2298, n. 2) is a vindictive penalty.

In order to remove every doubt, the censures should be named as to persons and species, and hence terms should be used which clearly indicate the nature of the penalty according to the common usage of the Church and the schools. This is true chiefly of a censure ferendae sententiae, or rather, let us say, of a censure ab homine. For a penalty a iure or latae sententiae is already clearly marked out and only requires the verification of the criminal act. Thus a censure latae sententiae does not demand a canonical admonition, though a declaratory sentence may be necessary in certain circumstances (can. 2232). The reason for this wording lies in the necessity of an external and sufficient manifestation of the superior's will.[7]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

From this it is also apparent why the legislator presumes censures rather than vindictive penalties. For although censures are grievous penalties, yet absolution must be granted as soon as contumacy ceases (can. 2248, §2), whereas vindictive penalties may, but must not, be removed by dispensation or relaxation. Besides, vindictive penalties may be meted out for past crimes, but censures are inflicted for delinquencies which are of a prospective and enduring nature.[8] The presumption here mentioned is that called iuris, but not iuris et de iure, and hence admits direct as well as indirect evidence (can. 1825 f.).

III. Can. 2256 explains the terms used to designate certain effects or consequences of penalties which occur in the following canons.

a) By divine offices[9] are to be understood those functions of power of order (potestatis ordinis) which have been established by divine or ecclesiastical authority and are performed only by the clergy. Such are the celebration of Holy Mass, the administration of the Sacraments and sacramentals (blessings, sepulture, public service, preaching, choir service, processions) etc.

b) Legal ecclesiastical acts are those of official administrators of ecclesiastical property; those of the following persons employed in the ecclesiastical court: judge, auditor, relator, defensor vinculi (for marriage and ordination), fiscal promotor and promotor of faith

7 Wernz, l. c., VI, n. 165 ff., p. 169 f.

8 Laymann, l. c., n. 3.

9 Cfr. can. 2259, § 1; private

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(for beatification and canonization), courier and beadle, lawyer and proxy; those of sponsors at Baptism and Confirmation; — the (active) voice[10] or right of voting at ecclesiastical elections, including those held by monastic chapters and chapters of religious communities and acts of actual (not habitual) exercise of the ius-patronatus or advowson.

Art. I

EXCOMMUNICATION

In general terms excommunication means the act of excluding or the state of being excluded from the communion of the faithful; practically speaking, the Church is the society of the faithful.

Being therefore, an autonomous society, the Church is logically entitled to set up conditions not only for admittance, but also for remaining in what is a juridically closed society. In other words, the Church, like any other organization, has the power to deprive unworthy members of the rights and privileges of membership. Of course, a complete or radical loss of membership is impossible, since the baptismal character is indelible. But the bonds of external communion can be severed. This punishment was hinted at very plainly when our Lord said: "If he will not hear the church, let him be to thee as the heathen and publican."[11] Excommunication was no doubt also understood when the Apostle said: "deliver such a one to Satan" and "put away the evil one from among yourselves."[12] devotions are not included in this term; Eichmann, l. c., p. 90.

10 Since the text reads suffragium ferre, it can only mean the active, not passive, voice (can. 19); cfr. Wernz, l. c., n. 114, p. 117; Eichmann, l. c., p. 90.

11 Matth. 18, 17.

12 I Cor. 5, 5, 13; II Thess. 3, 14; Kober, Der Kirchenbann, 1863, p. 9 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The technical name for excommunication is ἀορισμός, sometimes with the adjective "entire" or accompanied by the word anathema. The words "excommunicati et ecclesia eiecti" are used by ancient synods.[13] The effect of excommunication was separation from the community of the faithful, in order to bring the delinquent to his senses, but also to purify and protect the community itself.

Besides this entire or full separation, there came into existence, towards the beginning of the fifth century, a milder form of exclusion, which consisted in forbidding the culprit to participate in the Eucharistic supper in certain parts of the public service, and in prayer. This minor excommunication was often connected with public penance, but after the public penitential system in the IXth century was abated, it developed into a separate excommunication of a peculiar disciplinary character. In virtue of the Decree of Martin V, "Ad evitanda," of 1418, this penalty was incurred by those who unlawfully conversed or communicated with excommunicated persons and by such as were guilty of transgressing the privileguim canonis, i. e., the notorious beaters of clerics.[14]

Mention was made above of anathema[15] as distinct from excommunication. The term occurs in the Decree of Gratian,[16] which permits us to look upon anathema as major or full excommunication, whilst excommunication without any further addition and as distinguished from or opposed to, anathema would be identical with minor excom-

13 Thus the Synod of Antioch, A. D. 341, c. 1 (Mansi, Coll. Concil., II. 1307): ἀκοινωνήτους καὶ ἀποβλήτους; those who refused to conform to the celebration of Easter as prescribed by the Council of Nicaea.

14 The text is preserved in two somewhat different wordings; see Hollweck, l. c., Appendix I, p. 355; infra, can. 2258.

15 See Numb. XXI, 3; I Cor. XVI, 22; "anathema, maranatha."

16 See c. 12, C. 3, q. 4; c. 41, C. II, q. 3; Kober, l. c., p. 37.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

munication,[17] although the distinction is not very clear. Therefore Gregory IX simplified the terminology by defining excommunication pure and simple as full or major excommunication[18] and leaving "minor excommunication" untouched. Anathema then appears as the more solemn form of pronouncing or declaring excommunication. Maranatha[19] merely enhanced the outward solemnity. The excommunicatio minor was officially abolished by the Constitution "Apostolicae Sedis," 1869, and the commentators who held that it had been abolished —at least as censura latae sententiae et iuris—were upheld by an authentic decision of the Holy Office.[20] The Code leaves no room for minor excommunication in whatever form.

Our text first defines the nature and species of excommunication and then determines its effects.

NATURE AND DIVISION

Can. 2257

§1. Excommunicatio est censura qua quis excluditur a communione fidelium cum effectibus qui in canonibus, qui sequuntur, enumerantur, quique separari nequeunt.

§2. Dicitur quoque anathema, praesertim si cum sollemnitatibus infligatur quae in Pontificali Romano describuntur.

17 C. 58, X, V, 39.

18 Kober, l. c., p. 38.

19 I Cor. XVI, 22. It means: Until the Lord cometh or returneth; see Suarez, De Cens., disp. IX, sect. 2, n. 4 f.

20 S. O., Dec. 5, 1883 (Coll. P. F., n. 1608); Hollweck, l. c., p. 114. It would be well if the old formula for "General Absolution" granted on some occasions would also be recast.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Can. 2258

§1. Excommunicati alii sunt vitandi, alii tolerati.

§2. Nemo est vitandus, nisi fuerit nominatim a Sede Apostolica excommunicatus, excommunicatio fuerit publice denuntiata et in decreto vel sententia expresse dicatur ipsum vitari debere, salvo praescripto can. 2343, §1, n. 1.

§1. Excommunication is a censure excluding a person from the communion of the faithful and accompanied by the inseparable effects mentioned in the following canons.

In order to understand this exclusion it must be remembered that the Church is a juridical as well as a spiritual society, consisting of a body and a soul, similar to an individual or physical person. To the soul (anima) of the Church are referred sanctifying grace, the theological virtues (faith, hope, and charity), the supernatural moral virtues, as well as the gifts of the Holy Ghost. To the body (corpus) of the Church belong the visible members, as organized and governed by the lawful authority, also the external means conducive to the purpose of the Church, such as Sacraments and sacramentals, worship, the word of God, offices and benefices.[21]

The relation of the individual Catholic to the body of the Church is sometimes styled external communion, whilst his connection with the soul of the Church is called internal communion.[22] This latter communion is not per se severed by excommunication, as grace and charity can-21 Mazzella, De Religione et Ecclesia, 1892, p. 344 f.

22 Reiffenstuel, V, 39, n. 55 ff., who, however, distinguishes communio pure interna, externa et mixta,—the two latter making up the external.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

not be taken away by the penal sword of the Church, but are lost only through grievous personal guilt. And as this guilt can be repaired by perfect contrition, it may happen that one is excommunicated and yet lives in the friendship of God. Besides, faith and hope may coëxist with mortal sin.[23] Therefore, the exclusion from the communion of the faithful concerns the external union with the Church (corpus Ecclesiae) only. But even this severance, as was stated at the beginning of this article, cannot be radical, otherwise an excommunicated person would have to be rebaptized, which would imply the fallacy that the character of Baptism is not indelible. Therefore an aptitudinal or habitual relation to, or bond with, the body of the Church remains even after the sentence of excommunication has gone into effect. Nevertheless it is quite true that, as St. Chrysostom says,[24] excommunication is the heaviest and severest of all penalties. For it entails spiritual poverty and helplessness and exposure to more vehement attacks from the powers of darkness, which are apt to lead to obstinacy and final despair.

This spiritual helplessness is apparent from the effects or consequences of excommunication. These are called inseparable from excommunication (qui separari nequeunt) because they always follow in its trail. They are neither modified nor extended, unlike suspension, which admits restriction.

The text is also directed against the assumption of a major and minor excommunication; and, therefore, the sentence of minor excommunication (ab homine) must be considered as abolished. The reason for this inseparability is easy to perceive. Actual membership in the Church is totally lost by excommunication. Nor is

[23] C. 28, X, V, 39.

[24] Contra Gentiles; see Hollweck, l. c., p. 115.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

there any essential or juridical difference between excommunication and anathema, for the latter, as §2 of can. 2257 states, mainly means added solemnity, especially the solemn pronouncement of the formula of excommunication contained in the Pontificale Romanum.[25]

§2. Two classes of excommunicated persons are mentioned in can. 2258, viz.: those who are to be avoided (vitandi) and those who are tolerated (tolerati). This distinction is substantially, although not technically, embodied in the well-known decree of Martin V (1418), "Insuper ad evitanda." Note, however, that this decree has come down in two different readings, one of them being that of the Council of Constance, as reported by St. Antoninus of Florence, the other that preserved in the acts of the Vth Lateran Council. The difference is rather substantial. For the Constance text mentions two kinds of vitandi: those publicly denounced and the notorious beaters of clerics; whereas the Lateran text enumerates three: the two just named and those who have so notoriously fallen into a sentence of excommunication that "no artifice can conceal it and no pretext of law excuse it."[26]

The Code, in §2 of can. 2258, rather favors the Constance text, which it considerably modifies, eliminating the notorious beaters of clerics and restricting personal denunciation to that made by the Apostolic See. Hence it says that only those are vitandi who:

a) Have been excommunicated nominally by the Apostolic See,

b) Whose excommunication was publicly announced, and 25 Title: "Ordo excommunicandi et absolvendi"; see also c. 106, C. II, q. 3, concerning the form of excommunication and anathema.

26 Hollweck, l. c., Appendix I, p. 355.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

c) Who have been expressly declared to be vitandi in the decree or sentence.

All these marks must concur in order to constitute an excommunicated person a vitandus.

Ad a). The Apostolic See is here understood as defined in can. 7, viz.: the Roman Pontiff or the Congregations, Tribunals, and Offices of the Roman Court.

Nominatim or by name means mentioning the excommunicated person's name or describing him so that no doubt remains as to his identity.[27] If only one name is mentioned, the accomplices, followers, and protectors of the excommunicatus are not vitandi, even though they commit an act forbidden under threat of excommunication, for there is no excommunication latae sententiae which renders one a vitandus.[28]

Ad b). The excommunication must be publicly announced (publice denuntiata), which is achieved by an authentic edict or decree; thus publication in the "Acta Apostolicae Sedis" would certainly be sufficient; also publication in a diocesan newspaper, if this is the official mouthpiece of the episcopal court. Publication in ordinary newspapers cannot claim an official character, and therefore one would not have to heed such a notice.[29] Neither would a denunciation before two witnesses be a public one, so that one thus denounced would become a vitandus.[30]

Ad c). The sentence or decree must expressly mention the fact that the excommunicated person is to be avoided; for, as stated above, there is no excommunication latae

27 Thus, for instance, Napoleon was excommunicated without mentioning his name, but clearly designated; Kober, Der Kirchenbann, p. 259.

28 Bened. XIV, De Syn. Dioec., VII, 68, 4; Hollweck, l. c., p. 123.

29 This applies also to the Osservatore Romano, because it is not the official organ of the Vatican.

30 Hollweck, l. c., p. 123.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sententiae or a iure which ipso facto produces that effect. A decree is issued if no formal procedure is followed, because the fact of the criminal act and the contumacy are established. A sentence is issued after a trial.

Now, from these three combined conditions only one exception is made, viz., that mentioned under can. 2343, §1, n. 1: for those who lay violent hands on the person of the Roman Pontiff. This is a remnant of the legislation concerning notorious beaters of clerics, but restricted to the sacred person of the Pontiff.

We may add that the distinction between vitandi and tolerati is not to be taken as intrinsically affecting the nature and consequences of excommunication. Both classes of excommunicati are equally cut off from the communion of the faithful, both experience the same effects, as far as religious communion is concerned.[31] The only difference regards civil intercourse, as will be seen under can. 2267.

INSEPARABLE EFFECTS

Suarez [32] notes that, although the adequate effect of excommunication is but one, namely, total exclusion from the communion of the faithful, yet in that communion may be distinguished several rights and favors. Privation of these rights, therefore, constitutes as many effects of excommunication.

The Code enumerates these effects, first, as to the 31 Suarez thought that an excommunicatus toleratus was still a member of the Church (De fide, disp. IX, sect. 1, n. 4); but Bellarmine (De Ecclesia Milit., l. III, c. 6) held the correct doctrine; cfr. Mazzella, De Religione et Ecclesia, 1892, p. 474; Hollweck, l. c., p. 115 f. A difference is noted in can. 2262, § 2, n. 2, which seems to partake of the spiritual nature.

32 De Censuris, disp. IX, procem. (Vol. XXIII, p. 260).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

officia divina, then as to actus legitimi, and, finally, as to civil intercourse.

EXCLUSION FROM DIVINE OFFICES

Can. 2259

§1. Excommunicatus quilibet caret iure assistendi divinis officiis, non tamen praedicationi verbi Dei.

§2. Si passive assistat toleratus, non est necesse ut expellatur; si vitandus, expellendus est, aut, si expelli nequeat, ab officio cessandum, dummodo id fieri possit sine gravi incommodo; ab assistentia vero activa, quae aliquam secumferat participationem in celebrandis divinis officiis, repellatur non solum vitandus, sed etiam quilibet post sententiam declaratoriam vel condemnatoriam aut alioquin notorie excommunicatus.

No excommunicated person has the right to assist at divine services; the only exception is hearing the word of God, which, therefore, is not forbidden. In the olden time even gentiles and heretics were allowed in church until the Mass of the catechumens began.[33] The sermon, though an ecclesiastical or divine office, and therefore specially mentioned in the text, is intended for instruction and correction.[34]

What divine offices are has been stated under can. 2256, n. 1, viz.: the acts of public worship performed in the name of the Church by her clergy, e. g., the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, the canonical office publicly recited by those who are obliged to recite it in virtue of can. 135 or can. 610, public prayers, processions (see can. 1290), blessings and consecrations performed according to the 33 C. 67, Dist. 1, de consecr. 34 C. 43, X, V, 39.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

liturgical books of the Church.[35] Many popular devotions, like the Rosary, the Stations of the Cross, etc., even if recited under the leadership of a priest, are not divine offices in the sense of our text, and therefore an excommunicated person is not debarred[36] from them.

1. Assistance at sermons or lectures (praedicatio verbi Dei) does not permit assistance at the divine service,[37] preceding or following, as stated in §2.

2. Since the right of assisting at Mass is taken away, no obligation remains to hear Mass on Sundays and holydays. The most that can be asserted is the imputation of voluntarium in causa if an excommunicatus should neglect to ask for absolution for a considerable time[38] (but see can. 2254).

3. Somewhat different is the obligation of reciting the Breviary, privately, not in choir; all authors say that this duty remains, since the clergyman is a public person, and is, as a rule, furthermore obliged by reason of a benefice.[39]

§2 of can. 2259 determines more precisely the extent of the exclusion from divine offices. A twofold distinction is made: between active and passive assistance, and between tolerati and vitandi. Active assistance entails a certain participation in the celebration of divine offices; such as acting as sacristan, or acolythe, or sacred minister or organist, or choir-singer, or as a witness at weddings.[40] (For the matrimonial ceremony is both a 35 Laymann, l. c., I., I, tr. V, p. II, c. 1, n. 6.

36 See Stimmen der Zeit, July 1920, Vol. 50, p. 316.

37 Laymann, l. c.

38 This is what Lehmkuhl says, II, n. 892, and is sententia communis; see Schmalzgrueber, V, 39, n. 131; Hollweck, l. c., p. 119.

39 Laymann, l. c., Lehmkuhl, l. c. The reciting clergyman should say "Exaudi," etc., instead of "Dominus vobiscum," sub veniali. He may also, for reasons of necessity or utility, employ a companion; Hilarius a Sexten, l. c., p. 57.

40 C. 7, C. 11, q. 3. Congregational singing of liturgical songs, or

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Sacrament on the side of the contracting parties, and a sacramental because of the nuptial blessing). Passive attendance may be understood as inactive or inert participation, which, of course excludes the recitation of prayers in common with the other faithful.

The text then says:

a) That passive assistance may be permitted to a toleratus, and it is not necessary to expel him from the assembly, e. g., from the church or chapel, although the priest who says Mass and others may know of the excommunication.

b) Active assistance must be denied not only to vitandi, but also to any one who is excommunicated, even though toleratus, after a declaratory or condemnatory sentence has been issued or the excommunication has become notorious. This is in keeping with can. 2232, which safeguards the good name of the delinquent as long as no sentence or notoriety renders him disreputable.

c) Vitandi are denied active as well as passive assistance and must be expelled from the place where divine services are held.[41] Should expulsion be impossible,[42] because of great inconvenience, the divine office must cease at once, unless the rubrics demand a continuance. Thus, for instance, if Mass has already proceeded to the beginning of the Canon, it must be continued until Communion, inclusively, after which the priest should admonish the culprit to depart and, in case of resistance, leave the altar immediately if this can be done without serious conseparticipation therein, would fall under active assistance.

41 The constant formula in the Decretals is: "excommunicatis et interdictis penitus exclusis"; cc. 43, 57, X, V, 39; c. 17, X, V, 40 and passim.

42 Formerly those who incited to disobedience in this regard or proved stubborn incurred the excommunication reserved to the Holy See; c. 2, Clem. V, 10.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

quences.[43] The same applies to the distribution of Communion outside of the Mass. If quarrels or other evil results must be feared in case of interruption, the divine office may be completed. On the other hand, even a priest or religious who is vitandus may be expelled by laymen or a policeman without fear of violating the privilege of clerical immunity.[44]

RECEPTION AND ADMINISTRATION OF SACRAMENTS AND SACRAMENTALS

Can. 2260

§1. Nec potest excommunicatus Sacramenta recipere; imo post sententiam declaratoriam aut condemnatoriam nec Sacramentalia.

§2. Quod attinet ad ecclesiasticam sepulturam, servetur praescriptum can. 1240, §1, n. 2.

Can. 2261

§1. Prohibetur excommunicatus licite Sacramenta et Sacramentalia conficere et ministrare, salvis exceptionibus quae sequuntur.

§2. Fideles, salvo praescripto §3, possunt ex qualibet iusta causa ab excommunicato Sacramenta et Sacramentalia petere, maxime si alii ministri desint, et tunc excommunicatus requisitus potest eadem ministrare neque ulla tenetur obligatione causam a requirente percontandi.

§3. Sed ab excommunicatis vitandis necnon ab aliis excommunicatis, postquam intercessit sententia con-

[43] He may finish in the sacristy or simply close the Mass there and then; Laymann, l. c.

[44] Cfr. c. 16, X, V, 39; Laymann, l. c.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

demnatoria aut declaratoria, fideles in solo mortis periculo possunt petere tum absolutionem sacramentalem ad normam can. 882, 2252, tum etiam, si alii desint ministri, cetera Sacramenta et Sacramentalia.

These two canons are closely related to each other, because both treat of the same subject, viz.: the Sacraments and Sacramentals. Can. 2260 determines the reception or passive use of the Sacraments, whilst can. 2261 treats of the minister or active administration of these means of grace.

1. No excommunicated person can (lawfully) receive the Sacraments, and after a declaratory or condemnatory sentence he cannot even receive the Sacramentals.[45] Notice the word "lawfully"; we have added it, within brackets, because it conveys the true meaning of the text; for the reception of the Sacraments by an excommunicated person would be valid, though illicit, with the exception of Penance. The reason is that the efficacy of the Sacraments in general does not depend on human or ecclesiastical will and command, but on the institution of Christ, but the validity of the Sacrament of Penance depends on jurisdiction, which may be taken away by ecclesiastical authority.[46]

The use of the sacramentals (can. 1144) by an excommunicated person is forbidden only after a declaratory or condemnatory sentence of excommunication has been issued. Sacramentals may be considered under a twofold aspect:

a) As acts or things of a private person or for private devotion and pious use, or

b) As sacred things purposely used for the sake of the

[45] See cc. 32, 59, X, V, 39.

[46] Laymann, l. c., c. I, tr. V, p. 5, c. 2, n. 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

spiritual benefit which accrues to them from the blessing or consecration of the Church. As public or ecclesiastical means of devotion they are forbidden to the excommunicated. But in their private devotion they may make use of them. Thus the use of sacred images, Holy Water, the sign of the Cross is permitted them.[47]

Excommunicated persons may even enter a church privately to pray there. On the other hand, priests are not allowed to impart blessings to them, e. g., bless candles, bread, etc., for them or give them the blessing post partum; for this would be not merely private but public worship. It may also be noted that, as excommunicated persons are obliged sub gravi to abstain from receiving the Sacraments (urgent cases — see can. 2252, 2254 — excepted) so ministers are bound to refrain from administering these to such persons.[48]

Concerning ecclesiastical burial consult can. 1240, §1, n. 2, which excludes from this sacramental all excommunicated persons against whom a declaratory or condemnatory sentence has been issued; a fortiori, of course, the vitandi.

Can. 2261, §1 prohibits excommunicated persons from administering the Sacraments and sacramentals, and priests from saying Mass.

Here the text expressly uses licite (lawfully), which undoubtedly refers to all the Sacraments, except Penance, under certain conditions explained in can. 2264. As the power of order, which is required for the administration of the Sacraments, cannot be lost, the validity is not 47 The use of the Sacramentals is permitted, not in order to obtain the fruits derived from the blessing of the Church, but to venerate them; Hilarius a Sexten, l. c., p. 56. It may even be useful, ex opere operantis, inasmuch as this act may produce a proper disposition on the part of the excommunicated person.

48 Suarez, De Censuris, disp. X, sect. 1 and 2; efr. can. 855; can. 2364.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

endangered. Neither is the Sacrament of Matrimony invalid if contracted by excommunicated parties,[49] provided of course the form be duly observed. The penalties[50] inflicted on such as violate this canon are stated under can. 2333, §3. Besides, they become irregular according to can. 985, n. 7.

However, there are exceptions stated in our canon, and consequently the penalty and irregularity just mentioned do not affect those administering the Sacraments under such circumstances. The exceptions are:

1. Provided the minister is not a vitandus or under a declaratory or condemnatory sentence, the faithful may, for any just reason, ask him to administer the Sacraments and sacramentals to them. This is more especially true if no other minister is available, in which case the excommunicated minister thus asked may administer the Sacraments and sacramentals without as much as inquiring for the reason why the petitioner wishes to receive them. Hence the faithful are to judge in such cases whether the reason is just. Any reason may be called just which promotes devotion or wards off temptations or is prompted by real convenience, for instance, if one does not like to call another minister.

This mitigation—such it is even in comparison with Martin V's decree "Ad evitanda" — is accorded only in case the minister is not vitandus nor under a declaratory or condemnatory sentence, according to

2. The second exception. If the minister, i. e., priest, is a vitandus or excommunicated in virtue of a condem-

49 For the parties themselves are the ministers of this Sacrament, neither would they receive it invalidly (though unworthily), if under censure; what the assisting priest has to do in such cases is explained in can. 1066.

50 Formerly deposition was decreed for the ministers; see cc. 6, 7, C. 11, q. 3; c. 109, C. 11, q. 3 somewhat mitigated; cc. 3-6, X, V, 27.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

natory or declaratory sentence, the faithful may demand from him absolution in danger of death, even though other priests be present who are not excommunicated,[51] but other Sacraments or sacramentals they may receive from such a priest only if no other ministers are available.

"Deesse" is not precisely synonymous with "non adesse" (see can. 1098, n. 2), for the former term, in classical language, means "to fail, to be wanting"; yet in connection with an object in the dative case it may also signify, "to be absent, not to be there."[52] Hence by a benign, though legitimate, interpretation we dare say that if no other non-excommunicated priests are present, an excommunicated one may administer all the Sacraments and sacramentals when there is danger of death. This interpretation is justified by the psychological condition of the sick person and affords another proof of the kindness of the Church.

EXCLUSION FROM THE SUFFRAGIA

Can. 2262

§1. Excommunicatus non fit particeps indulgentiarum, suffragiorum, publicarum Ecclesiae precum.

§2. Non prohibentur tamen:

1.° Fideles privatim pro eo orare;

2.° Sacerdotes Missam privatim ac remoto scandalo pro eo applicare; sed, si sit vitandus, pro eius conversione tantum.

We have retained in the inscription the old term (suffragia) common to all the acts mentioned in the text:

51 See can. 882, 2252.

52 Thus Cicero; convivio puer defuit; bello defuisti.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

indulgences, suffrages, public prayers. The technical term for this effect of excommunication is "privatio communium ecclesiae euffragiorum," viz.: privation of the spiritual aids by which members of the Church assist one another in order either to atone for temporal punishments (per satisfactionem) or to obtain, either directly or indirectly, spiritual benefits (per impetrationem). If these suffrages are offered privately, by private persons in their own name, they may be applied to excommunicated persons, and therefore the canon has nothing to do with these.[53] But if they are offered in the name and by authority of the Church, they fall under the present law, because the Church wills to exclude the excommunicated from these suffrages.[54]

The text (§1) says that the excommunicated do not partake of the indulgences, suffrages, and public prayers of the Church, either by way of satisfaction or impetration.

a) Indulgences cannot be gained by, nor applied to, excommunicated persons, and no private application is possible because all indulgences flow from the treasury of the Church, over which her public authority has absolute control.

b) Suffrages are especially the fruits of Holy Mass, and prayers or good works, such as alms and penances, offered by way of satisfaction.

c) The public prayers of the Church may be understood as prayers chiefly, though not exclusively, of impetratory intercession, offered in the name of the 53 Cfr. Suarez, l. c., disp. IX, sect. 1, n. 1 ff. (Vol. 23, p. 260 f.); Hilarius a Sexten, l. c., p. 58; Hollweck, l. c., p. 118; private suffragia, i. e., such as are offered in his own name by the priest, may be performed for excommunicated persons; thus he may pray, fast, give alms, and even offer the holy Sacrifice in his own name for them.

54 Suarez, l. c.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Church, such as all the liturgical prayers are: the choir service or recitation of the holy office, processions, and blessings, as far as they are contained in the liturgical books. Excommunicated persons, whether vitandi or tolerati, are excluded from all these. Navarrus [55] held that these suffragia could be applied by any priest, provided he was convinced that the excommunicated person was in the state of grace. This view is no longer tenable. Our text is plainly against it, but it does admit, what was quite commonly held and partly modified by previous decisions, namely, that

a) The faithful may pray privately for excommunicated persons, by way of impetration and satisfaction,[56] which, of course, depends solely on the acceptance of God.

b) Priests may privately offer the Mass for a toleratus, provided no scandal is given; but for a vitandus only for his conversion. What private application means is not expressly stated in our Code and would be difficult to define briefly. Private application may mean the application of the most special fruits of holy Mass, which the priest gains for himself as a private person. There cannot be any doubt that he may apply this fruit to any kind of excommunicated person.[57] As to the fructus ministerialis, or special fruit to be applied to one who asks for it, there is doubt. If we identify privatim applicare with a private Mass, it would mean that only a solemn or conventual or parochial Mass is excluded.[58] On 55 Navarrus held this view against the clear text of the "Ad evitanda"; Hollweck, l. c., p. 119, but was opposed by Suarez (De Cens., disp., IX, sect. 3, n. 2); at least Suarez excluded any direct intention.

56 Suarez, l. c., disp. IX, sect. 5, n. 3: "Dicendum est, licitum esse privatim pro excommunicato orare, propriam et personalem satisfactionem offerendo," and this he extends (ib., n. 5) to the Memento in holy Mass.

57 See preceding note from Suarez; also Hollweck, l. c., p. 118.

58 Thus Eichmann, l. c., p. 94; Ayrinhac, l. c., p. 124 seems to imply the same.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the other hand, if we interpret private application as meaning the priest's own fruits, then we should have to exclude the ministerial fruit, and no stipend (in the proper sense) could be accepted for such application. The intention of the lawgiver here is uncertain. The text says that a Mass may be applied even for a vitandus, but only for his conversion. This was allowed for Greek schismatics by a decision of the Holy Office, which also admitted the acceptance of a stipend.[59] May we not draw the legitimate conclusion: If application of the ministerial fruit is allowed because a stipend is permitted, when the purpose is conversion, even for a vitandus, it is logical to say that private application implies application of the ministerial fruit and acceptance of a stipend, provided the Mass is no conventual or parochial or solemn one and scandal is avoided, for instance, by not publishing the Mass or not making it known to any one. A fortiori a private application, if no scandal is given, is permitted for an excommunicatus toleratus. The Holy Office also wishes all scandal removed in case Freemasons should order Masses and forbids the clergy to accede to the pressure and commands of such if they insist on having the Masses published in papers or invitations.[60] It goes without saying that the priest is not allowed to countenance any disobedience or disregard of censures by a too free acceptance of Mass stipends. Solemn conventual or parochial Masses cannot be lawfully offered for excommunicated persons, either living or dead. Besides, it is a rather venturesome interpretation to allow a Mass to be said for a dead vitandus, i. e., one who died under such an excommunication, because the text allows it to be [59] S. O., April 19, 1837 (Coll. P. F., n. 858); see our Comment., Vol. IV, p. 143 f.

[60] S. O., July 5, 1878 (Coll. P. F., n. 1495).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google done only for his conversion,[61] which after death is impossible. But for a dead excommunicatus tolcratus a private application, provided no scandal arises therefrom, may and is permitted.

EXCLUSION FROM LEGAL ACTS

Can. 2263

Removetur excommunicatus ab actibus legitimis ecclesiasticis intra fines suis in locis iure definitos; nequit in causis ecclesiasticis agere, nisi ad normam can. 1654; prohibetur ecclesiasticis officiis seu muneribus fungi, concessisque antea ab Ecclesia privilegiis frui.

Can. 2264

Actus iurisdictionis tam fori externi quam fori interni positus ab excommunicato est illicitus; et, si lata fuerit sententia condemnatoria vel declaratoria, etiam invalidus, salvo praescripto can. 2261, §3; secus est validus, imo etiam licitus, si a fidelibus petitus sit ad normam mem. can. 2261, §2.

Can. 2265

§1. Quilibet excommunicatus:

1.° Prohibetur iure eligendi, praesentandi, nominandi;

61 Thus Ayrinhac, l. c., p. 124; the quotations from Wernz and Gasparri do not prove his assumption; our text is too clear: "sed pro eius conversione tantum." Therefore, what we said in Vol. IV, p. 145 f. of this Commentary, though we made no incorrect statement, must be supplemented and completed by what we say above. We add: From this it is evident that, if absolution from censures is given, even after death, every restriction as to the application of Masses is removed.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2.° Nequit consequi dignitates, officia, beneficia, pensiones ecclesiasticas aliudve munus in Ecclesia;

3.° Promoveri nequit ad ordines.

§2. Actus tamen positus contra praescriptum §1, nn. 1, 2, non est nullus, nisi positus fuerit ab excommunicato vitando vel ab alio excommunicato post sententiam declaratoriam vel condemnatoriam; quod si haec sententia lata fuerit, excommunicatus nequit praeterea gratiam ullam pontificiam valide consequi, nisi in pontificio rescripto mentio de excommunicatione fiat.

These three canons logically comprise the effects of legal acts, including acts of jurisdiction.

1. Forensic and honorary acts are those which the canon law permits the members of the Church to perform, especially in the ecclesiastical court and on ecclesiastical occasions.

a) The right of acting as plaintiff is denied to excommunicated persons except in their own case of excommunication, and an excommunicatus as well as his report or finding may be rejected as suspect; he is allowed to be neither arbiter nor counsel (lawyer).[62]

b) Excommunicated persons are not allowed to act as sponsors at Baptism or Confirmation, as far as stated under can. 765 f. and can. 795 f.

c) They are not allowed to act as administrators of ecclesiastical property or to perform any ecclesiastical commission, for all these are comprised by the name of ecclesiastical offices and functions.

d) They may not enjoy any privileges or favors

62 See can. 1654; 1754, § 2; 1795, §2; 1931; 2256, n. 2; c. 17, C. 6, q. 1; c. 8, 6°, V, 11.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

granted by the Church before they were excommunicated, no matter whether these were given by higher or inferior prelates.[63] Therefore absolution from censures, at least provisional, is added in most rescripts.

Note, however, that the text says: fungi and frui, from which it must be concluded that the prohibition only lasts until absolution from excommunication is granted, and no formal rehabilitation is required. Besides, it appears quite reasonable that forensic acts, i. e., acts in the ecclesiastical court, or rather exclusion from the office of judge, lawyer, auditor, counsel, promotor, should take effect only after a declaratory or condemnatory sentence. This seems necessary for the safety and certainty of juridical procedure.[64]

2. Acts of jurisdiction of the external and internal forum are mentioned in can. 2264 as follows:

a) Simply excommunicated persons can perform acts of jurisdiction validly (not licitly); their acts are not only valid, but even lawful, if the faithful ask such excommunicated persons to perform them, according to can. 2261, §2.

b) Persons excommunicated by a condemnatory or declaratory sentence, and a fortiori vitandi, can neither validly nor lawfully perform acts of jurisdiction, except in danger of death, according to can. 2261, §3. Acts of jurisdiction are here expressly declared to comprise both the internal and the external forum. An act of jurisdiction is the so-called missio canonica, because the commission to teach or preach, according to the more common 63 The text does not especially mention (can. 2256, n. 2) papal favors; therefore also episcopal grants or favors of Ordinaries are excluded; see c. 1, 6°, I, 3; Hollweck, l. c., p. 120, note 10.

64 See can. 2223, § 4, because the persons being public, the public welfare seems involved; Eichmann. l. c., p. 94 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

doctrine, is an act emanating from jurisdiction. Consequently this mission also is lost by excommunication.[65]

However, here, too, must be applied what our text allows for those simply excommunicated without a special sentence. Therefore, if an excommunicated priest would be asked to preach or teach, he could do it lawfully.

3. Can. 2265 concerns ecclesiastical offices and orders, either in the active or passive sense.

a) Excommunicated persons are excluded from the right of electing (voting), presenting, nominating; but the vote or presentation (iuspatronatus) or nomination is not invalid unless made by a vitandus or one excommunicated by a declaratory or condemnatory sentence. If a chapter or college has the right of electing, presenting, or nominating, the act is valid or invalid according to can. 167, §2. This privation lasts until the excommunication is removed.[66]

b) No excommunicated person may obtain any dignity, office, benefice, ecclesiastical pension, or other commission in the Church. Here again the invalidity of the act conferring these dignities, offices, etc., attaches only to a vitandus or one who is under a declaratory or condemnatory sentence, as §2 states. It may be added that no dignity is excepted. "Munus," which broadly signifies any office, may be understood of commissions or functions; thus, for instance, a proxy is not allowed or valid under given circumstances.[67]

65 Suarez, De Cens., disp. XII, sect. 2, n. 4; Hollweck, l. c., p. 121. Assistance at marriage is no act of jurisdiction; however, can. 1095, § 1, n. 1 must be consulted.

66 See can. 1470, § 4. Excommunicated Cardinals, pending the conclave or election, are not deprived of either the active or the passive vote, but only for this one occasion; ("Vacante Sede," n. 29). If a curious reader should ask; but what if, by a very improbable supposition, an excommunicated cardinal should be elected Pope? Answer: he would go to confession or ask any confessor to absolve him from the censure. That is all.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

c) No one may be licitly promoted to orders as long as he is excommunicated. Order is here taken according to can. 950, i. e., including all orders, even tonsure; for there is no reason why the term should be restricted to "holy" orders, nor does the context call for a milder interpretation.[68] A question might arise as to minor orders and tonsure, whether they would be invalidly conferred by a prelate who is under a declaratory or condemnatory sentence of excommunication, because these orders are not, properly speaking, Sacraments, but merely sacramentals. Comparing can. 2372 with our text, their validity can be solidly defended.

d) No one excommunicated by a declaratory or condemnatory sentence, including vitandi, can obtain any papal favor, unless mention is made of the excommunication in the papal rescript. Therefore, any favor, e. g., a monsignorship, a dispensation, an indulgence, etc., granted to such a person would be invalid unless it contained the clause: "non obstante excommunicatione or quacumque censura" or a similar one.[69]

67 See c. 15, X, I, 38; c. 24, X, II, 27; Hollweck, l. c., p. 121; Schmalzgrueber (V, 39, n. 154) excepted pensions, but our Code is plainly against any exception.

68 Ayrinhac, l. c., p. 126, says: "No one under excommunication should be promoted to holy orders."

69 Cfr. the Ordo Servandus in S. Cong. Trib. Off., Sept. 29, 1908, III, n. 6, where, however, only "nominatim excommunicati" are mentioned. The clausulae "ex plenitudine potestatis," "ex certa scientia" would not be sufficient; Suarez, De Cens., disp. XIII, sect. 2, n. 14.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

LOSS OF INCOME FROM DIGNITY, OFFICE, etc.

Can. 2266

Post sententiam condemnatoriam vel declaratoriam excommunicatus manet privatus fructibus dignitatis, officii, beneficii, pensionis, muneris, si quod habeat in Ecclesia; et vitandus ipsamet dignitate, officio, beneficio, pensione, munere.

As the income or revenue from ecclesiastical offices is justly denied to those who are cut off from the communion of the Church,[70] it follows that the material part or income cannot be claimed by an excommunicatus. However, self-execution is not required until a formal sentence has been issued, and hence

1. After a declaratory or condemnatory sentence the excommunicated clergyman — for these the text has chiefly in view — remains deprived of the fruits, i. e., revenues, salary, income, accruing from the dignity, office, benefice, pension, charge, which he holds in the Church.

A doubt indeed arises concerning the obligation of beneficiaries or office holders. Are they obliged in conscience (in foro interno) to make restitution of the fruits received from the time or moment in which the excommunication was incurred until the declaratory sentence was issued? The majority of authors say, yes.[71] However, this must be understood with due regard to can.

70 C. 53, X, II, 28.

71 Cfr. Suarez, De Cens., disp. XIII, sect. 2, n. 7 ff.—A question may arise concerning a charge (munus), for instance, organist, sexton, etc., when paid by the government or civil authority. Would the incumbent lose the income if he were excommunicated? By ecclesiastical law he undoubtedly would; but we hardly believe that the Church would urge the forfeiture.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2232, §1, which says that a penalty latae sententiae binds in both fora, but need not be observed if defamation should follow, nor can its observance be urged if the crime was not notorious. Consequently, the obligation of restitution runs from the moment the censure was incurred, but does not urge either in the internal or the external forum if loss of reputation would follow or if the crime was occult.

2. A vitandus loses not only the fruits, but also his dignity, office, benefice, pension, or charge, and consequently all these dignities and offices become vacant (can. 183, §1).

SOCIAL OR CIVIL INTERCOURSE

Can. 2267

Communionem in profanis cum excommunicato vitando fideles vitare debent, nisi agatur de coniuge, parentibus, liberis, famulis, subditis, et generatim nisi rationabilis causa excuset.

The faithful shall avoid social intercourse with vitandi. From this obligation are exempted those bound by matrimonial bonds, parents, children, servants, and subjects. Besides, any reasonable cause may excuse others.

The extent of this avoidance was expressed in the following verse: "Os, orare, vale, communio, mensa negatur." [72]

72 Cfr. the Glossa ad verbum aliis, c. 3, 6°, V, II; Hilarius a Sexten, l. c., p. 63; Hollweck, l. c., p. 124. But they also offered reasons which excused from this observance and put them in this verse: "Utile, lex, humile, res ignorata, necesse." Utile signified any spiritual or corporal utility; lex, the married couple; humile, submission or obedience, children and parents, masters and servants; res ignorata, ignorance of fact or law; necessitas, any spiritual or temporal necessity or need.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The os was taken as oral and epistolary intercourse; the orare as communion in private prayer; the vale as signs of special friendship, but not of common or usual salutations; communio as living in the same house and having commercial intercourse; mensa as eating at the same table and accepting invitations to banquets. Our text, being very broad, should not cause any alarm or misgiving, as if business would come to a standstill and social ties be rent assunder.

ART. II

THE INTERDICT

It is a rather venturesome attempt to say anything definite on the origin of this so-called censure. Broadly speaking, the opinion that the personal interdict was developed from temporary suspension, and the local interdict from excommunication, seems quite tenable.[1] Like other ecclesiastical disciplines, the interdict must not be presumed to have been introduced "cut and dried," but had its normal evolution from the ninth to the twelfth centuries,[2] when it appears as an independent penalty side by side with excommunication and suspension. It cannot, however, be denied that abuses had been committed, which may perhaps be excused, but cannot be defended on a juridical basis.[3] Local interdicts presuppose unity of faith and also, we dare say, the idea that

1 See Kober, Das Interdikt (Arch. für kath. K.-R., 1869, p. 3 ff.); Krebihl, The Interdict, its History and Operation, Washington 1909; Boudinhon, in Cath. Encycl., Vol. VIII, p. 73 f.; Hollweck, l. c., p. 126 ff.; Eichmann, l. c., p. 17 f.; Hinschius, K.-R., IV, 804 ff.; V, 13 ff.; 516 ff.; and the commentators on X, V, 39.

2 We find traces of a partial local interdict already in the VIth century, when certain churches of a city were closed for service: but such cases were extremely rare.

3 Boudinhon, l. c.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ecclesiastical authority laid a certain claim to territorial rights. The close interpenetration of Church and State in the Middle Ages made it possible to get this penalty respected by rulers and subjects. But the disruption of religious unity led to a mitigation of that "dangerous weapon" in the sixteenth century. The last general local interdict was imposed by Paul V, in 1606, on the Republic of Venice, without results. The interdict put on several Sicilian dioceses by Clement XI, in 1713, was also without practical effect. Of modern date are the vindictive interdicts imposed on the city of Adria, in 1909, and Galatina, in 1913, which are recorded in the official bulletin of the Holy See.[4] We also know that a congregation in one of our American dioceses was laid under the interdict some years ago by the Ordinary. But the use of this ecclesiastical penalty has, in the last two centuries, been exceedingly moderate.

The Code first defines an interdict, then sets forth who may inflict it and how far it extends, describes its effects, and, finally, mentions ingressus ecclesiae as a kind of interdict.

DEFINITION AND DIVISION

Can. 2268

§1. Interdictum est censura qua fideles, in communione Ecclesiae permanentes, prohibentur sacris quae in canonibus, qui sequuntur, enumeratur.

§2. Prohibitio fit vel directe per interdictum personale, cum personis ipsis usus eorum bonorum interdicitur; vel indirecte per interdictum locale, cum

[4] A. Ap. S., I, 765; V, 517.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

certis in locis eorundem dispensatio vel perceptio vetatur.

1. The Roman Law [5] mentions various interdicts, which, however, only remotely resemble the one described here. Formerly an interdict meant an order forbidding something to be done; but at present the term designates not only a pretorian restraint, but a particular penalty, with effects attached by common law. Hence the Code defines it as a censure by which the faithful, while remaining in communion with the Church, are forbidden certain [sacred things or benefits] enumerated in the following canons.

a) The generic nomenclature "censura" is here retained, although the interdict may also be inflicted as a vindictive penalty.[5a] In case of doubt, therefore, it is to be regarded as a censure.[6]

b) In communione Ecclesiae permanentes indicates an essential difference from excommunication, which does not leave union with or membership in the Church intact, but abolishes it. The interdict merely limits the practical use of that communion. Besides in an interdict the prohibition of sacred things is limited; but, unless so expressed in the law, it is unlimited in excommunication.

c) The term fideles, faithful, clearly insinuates that the interdict is also distinguished from suspension because the latter is inflicted on clerics only (can. 2256, §2); besides, suspension can never be local, but is always personal.[6a] This, of course, is also true of excommunication.

5 See Inst., IV, 15; Dig., 43, 1; 48, 22; Cod., VIII, 1., see our Commentary, Vol. VIII, p. 125.

5a See can. 2291, n. 1–2.

6 Can. 2256, § 2. A purely local interdict, if such a penalty were inflicted, would not be a censure, which strictly supposes a grievous, morally imputable transgression.

6a Hilarius a Sexten, l. c., p. 82.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

d) Concerning the effects of an interdict, the text simply says: "sacris," and to determine the import of these sacred things refers to the canons which immediately follow; besides these no others are enumerated. Note that the text does not mention inseparable effects, qui separari nequunt. This is logical, for the interdict does not disrupt communion with the faithful, and consequently we find that the extent is not the same for each kind of interdict.

2. Division. An interdict is personal when the prohibition directly concerns the personal use of certain sacred things, i. e., when persons are directly intended by the interdict;

b) It is local when in recto the place, and only indirectly the persons living in that place, are struck by this penalty. In interdicted places the administration or reception of sacred things or spiritual benefits is forbidden.

These are the two main divisions mentioned in can. 2269.

§ 2. However, the subdivisions, as they may be called and are expressly referred to in the following canons, may just as well be added here.

c) A general personal interdict is one laid upon a corporation as such, for instance, the entire (Catholic) population of a realm, province, diocese, parish,[7] chapter, or all the members of a religious community.

A general local interdict is one inflicted upon a place comprising several distinct places or juridical entities, for instance, a diocese, or province, or parish.

d) A special personal interdict is one imposed on [7] Can. 2269, § 1, calls an interdict laid upon a parish a general interdict; in the old ecclesiastical law a parish was never regarded as an autonomous entity.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

specified persons, for instance, on the pastor of a parish, or the administrator of a diocese.

A particular local interdict is one inflicted on a specified place, taking place (locus) in the stricter sense of locality, for instance, a specially designated church chapel, altar, or cemetery.[8]

AUTHORITIES WHO CAN INFLICT THE INTERDICT

Can. 2269

§1. Generale interdictum tam locale in territorium dioecesis, reipublicae, quam personale in populum dioecesis, reipublicae, ferri tantum potest a Sede Apostolica vel de eius mandato; interdictum vero generale in paroeciam vel paroeciae populum, et particulare sive locale sive personale, etiam Episcopus ferre potest.

§2. Interdictum personale sequitur personas ubique; locale non urget extra locum interdictum, sed in loco interdicto omnes etiam exteri aut exempti, excluso speciali privilegio, illud servare debent.

1. A general local interdict which is imposed upon the territory of a diocese or realm, and a general personal interdict which affects the people of a diocese or realm, can only be inflicted by the Apostolic See or by the latter's commission.

2. A general interdict which is to affect either an entire parish as such, or an entire congregation as such, or a

8 See Wernz, l. c., VI, p. 124, n. 218; Hilarius a Sexten, l. c., p. 83; Hollweck (l. c., p. 127, § 52, note 3) calls the interdict the most flexible of all censures; the Code does not entirely abolish this flexibility; but it does away with the so-called interdictum deambulatorium (c. 8, Clem. V, 8), which directly affected places, but virtually the persons.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google particular local or special interdict, may also be inflicted by the bishop.

Here the text appears to mention only an interdict ab homine. But there are a few interdicts which are incurred ipso iure [9] and therefore need only a declaratory sentence (can. 2223, §4; can. 2232, §1).

The bishop, and not the Ordinary, is mentioned, because the vicar-general cannot inflict such a penalty without a special mandate (can. 2220, §2). The vicar capitular or administrator, on the other hand, cannot be denied the right to place a parish under the interdict.[10]

Concerning the prelates regular of exempt religious, Suarez [11] justly observes that, although they may inflict a personal interdict by right and custom, yet custom denies them the right to impose a local interdict. For such a penalty is neither an adequate means of good government nor apt to edify the faithful.

The bishop may inflict an interdict without the consent of his chapter or consultors [12] and is not bound to call in a collegiate body of judges, if he proceeds in a judiciary way.[13] He may also impose it as a special order; [14] always provided that he does not overstep the power laid down in can. 2269, §1.

The question may arise whether the bishop could lay

9 The Code contains: one general interdict modo speciali reserved to the Ap. See (can. 2332); one personal interdict contracted ipso iure, but not reserved (can. 2338, § 4); two personal interdicts ferendae sententiae, can. 2328, 2356; one ab ingressu ecclesiae ipso iure, reserved to the ordinary, can. 2339; one incurred ipso iure but not reserved, can. 2338, § 3; one ferendae sententiae, can. 2329.

10 Trid., Sess. 24, c. 16, de ref.; Wernz, l. c., p. 229, n. 220.

11 De Cens., disp. XXXVI, sect. 1, n. 3 (ed. cit., Vol. 23, II, p. 253).

12 C. 1, X, V, 31, calls for such a consent, but custom has done away with this requirement (Suarez, l. c., n. 6); nor does the Code require it.

13 He may, but is not obliged to, entrust the judges with this affair; can. 1576.

14 Can. 1933, § 4.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google all the parishes of his dioceses, taken singly, under the interdict. We think not, on the basis of the law; at any rate, it would be very imprudent.

§2 of can. 2269 indicates the material extent of the interdict, personal and local, as follows:

1. A personal interdict follows the persons upon whom it is inflicted everywhere, and since the text does not distinguish between general personal and special personal interdicts, it is evident that both kinds are included, and consequently all the effects described in can. 2274 and 2275 follow the persons interdicted.

2. A local interdict binds only within, not outside, the boundaries of the interdicted place. But within the interdicted territory all, including strangers and exempt persons, are obliged to observe it. A special privilege alone exempts from its observance. The boundaries must be strictly understood, and not, as some seem to hold,[15] as if an extension were permissible in order to prevent contempt or neglect of the interdict.

Exteri or outsiders are obliged to observe an interdict as long as they remain in the interdicted territory.

Exemption here means personal, not local, exemption. Such exemption is granted by the Code to all regulars and their novices, also to some religious in virtue of a special privilege.[16] All these exempt religious must observe the local interdict,[17] unless, of course, it be particular, for instance, restricted to a church or chapel. But if exemption is taken for territorium nullius, or active and passive exemption, no matter whether it concerns only one, or two, or several parishes, the local interdict placed on a parish of another one's jurisdiction does 15 Thus Suarez, disp. XXXVI, sect. 2, n. 3.

16 See can. 615; can. 618.

17 See cc. 4, 11, 6°, V, 7; Trid., Sess. 25, c. 12 de Regg.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

not concern the exempt parish, even though this may lie like an enclave within the boundaries of the interdicted parish or territory. The jurisdiction, personal as well as local, of the interdicting prelate ceases there.[18]

The text allows an exception based on a special privilege, which means that only a directly granted privilege avails against a local interdict. No communication of privileges, therefore, is admissible.[19] Special privilege also signifies that freedom from interdict is not included in the general exemption.

EFFECTS OF AN INTERDICT

The effects of an interdict are separable from one another, as appears from the various exceptions made under certain conditions. The text first considers the local general and particular interdict, then the personal general and special interdict, and finally the effects of any interdict on such as are innocent of the crime for which the interdict was inflicted.

CONSEQUENCES OF LOCAL INTERDICTS

Can. 2270

§1. Interdictum locale sive generale sive particulare non vetat morientibus Sacramenta et Sacramentalia, servatis servandis, ministrare, sed prohibet in loco quodlibet divinum officium vel sacrum ritum, salvis exceptionibus de quibus in §2 huius canonis et in can. 2271, 2272.

18 Suarez takes a broader view (disp. XXXII, sect. 2, n. 12); but certainly not to the advantage of juridical precision.

19 See cc. 4, 11, 6°, V, 7; Reiffenstuel, V, 39, n. 196.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§2. In die Nativitatis Domini, Paschatis, Pentecostes, sanctissimi Corporis Christi te Beatae Mariae Virginis in caelum assumptae interdictum locale suspenditur, et prohibetur tantum collatio ordinum et sollemnis nuptiarum benedictio.

Can. 2271

Si interdictum fuerit locale generale et interdicti decreto aliud non caveatur expresse:

1°. Permittitur clericis, dummodo non sint ipsi personaliter interdicti, omnia divina officia et sacros ritus in quacunque ecclesia aut oratorio privatim obire, ianuis clausis, voce submissa et campanis non pulsatis;

2°. In ecclesia vero cathedrali, ecclesiis paroecialibus vel in ecclesia quae unica sit in oppido, in iisque solis, permittuntur unius Missae celebratio, asservatio sanctissimi Sacramenti, administratio baptismatis, Eucharistiae, poenitentiae, assistentia matrimoniis, exclusa benedictione nuptiali, mortuorum exsequiae, vetita tamen quavis sollemnitate, benedictio aquae baptismalis et sacrorum oleorum, praedicatio verbi Dei. In his tamen sacris functionibus prohibetur cantus et pompa in sacra supellectili et sonitus campanarum, organorum, aliorumve instrumentorum musicalium; sacrum autem Viaticum ad infirmos privatim deferatur.

Can. 2272

§1. In interdicto locali particulari, si interdictum fuerit altare vel sacellum alicuius ecclesiae, nullum sacrum officium seu sacer ritus in eisdem celebretur.

§2. Si interdictum fuerit coemeterium, fidelium

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

quidem cadavera sepeliri ibidem possunt, sed sine ullo ecclesiastico ritu.

§3. Si latum fuerit in certam ecclesiam vel oratorium:

1°. Si ecclesia fuerit capitularis nec interdictum sit Capitulum, valet praescriptum can. 2271, n. 1, nisi interdicti decretum praecipiat Missam conventualem celebrari et horas canonicas recitari in alia ecclesia aut oratorio;

2°. Si fuerit paroecialis, servetur praescriptum cit. can. 2271, n. 2, nisi interdicti decretum aliam ecclesiam pro interdicti tempore eidem substituat.

Can. 2273

Interdicta civitate, interdicta quoque manent loca accessoria etiam exempta et ipsa ecclesia cathedralis; interdicta ecclesia, interdicta sunt sacella contigua, non vero coemeterium; interdicto sacello, non est interdicta integra ecclesia nec, interdicto coemeterio, interdicta est ecclesia ipsi contigua, sed interdicta sunt omnia oratoria in coemeterio erecta.

1. General Prohibition. In a place laid either under a general or a particular local interdict, no divine offices or sacred rites may be performed. This is the general rule, and the terms must be employed according to their obvious meaning. Hence the celebration of Mass, the reservation of the Blessed Sacrament, preaching, administration of Sacraments or sacramentals or any ritual or liturgical function such as burials, may not take place in such places.[20] This, we said, is the rule.

20 Here again the strictly liturgical devotions are intended; consequently private devotions, such as the Rosary or the Stations of the

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2. Now follow the modifications which affect any local interdict, general or particular, and may therefore be called general modifications, such as were granted by the Decretals,[21] and are partly extended by the Code:

a) It is permitted to administer the Sacraments and sacramentals to the dying. This includes Extreme Unction [22] as well as the Viaticum and the Last Blessing. What servatis servandis means may be deduced from can. 2271, n. 2: the Viaticum must be privately carried to the sick according to can. 849. But the clause also hints at the rubrics as found in the Roman Missal and Ritual.[23]

b) On Christmas, Easter, Pentecost, Corpus Christi, and the Assumption (Aug. 15) the local interdict is suspended, and only the conferring of orders and the solemn nuptial blessing are forbidden. Hence solemn service with all pomp and liturgical display may be celebrated, but only on these days themselves, not during the octave.[24] When Corpus Christi is transferred to a Sunday, the Sunday is favored.

The particular modifications of a general local interdict are stated in can. 2271, provided the wording of the decree of interdict does not contain anything to the contrary, for the clergy in particular and for the faithful in general,

1. The clergy may privately perform all the divine

Cross, confraternities, processions led by laymen, are allowed; for the term "divina officia" (can. 2256, n. 2) does not include these.

21 Especially by the well-known caput "Alma," c. 24, 6°, V, 11; see c. 5, X, V, 38.

22 Reiffenstuel, V, 39, n. 203.

23 Missale Rom., tit. De Defectibus, c. VIII, n. 5; Rit. Rom., tit. IV, c. 4, n. 6 f.

24 Martin V, "Ineffabile," May 26, 1429, § 3, extended the privilege to Corpus Christi; this is upheld by the Code. But the extension to the Octave of Corpus Christi granted by Eugene IV ("Excellentissimum," May 26, 1433) is not according to the Code, which says "in die." Whether the Spaniards still enjoy this favor on the feast of the Immac. Conception seems doubtful.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

offices and sacred rites in any church or chapel.[25] But this general permission is conditional, and also circumscribed as to the manner in which these functions may be held.

a) The condition in the strict sense is that the clerics themselves be not personally interdicted, for if they were, can. 2275 would take effect.

b) The manner in which this service may be performed is described as follows: It is a private celebration, from which the faithful must be excluded.[26] It must be held januis clausis, i. e., behind closed doors, which indicates that the clergy only may be admitted. However, if the priest would have no cleric to serve his Mass, a layman could and should be admitted.

It must be held voce submissa, i. e., in a low voice, so that it can not be heard outside the church.[27]

It must finally be held without the bells being rung (campanis non pulsatis). However, canonists except from this prohibition the ringing of the Angelus bell and the bell for sermons.[28]

It may be added that this prerogative is granted to the clerical state, as such, whence it logically follows that every clergyman may hold such services. But mere assistance without coöperation could hardly be admitted. For the text clearly states obire, which signifies active service.

2. For the faithful in general the text grants the following mitigation under certain conditions:

a) The privileged churches are the cathedral and the parish churches, even though there may be several in one 25 Cfr. c. 24, 6°, V, 11.

26 Whether or not excommunicated or interdicted; Suarez, disp. XXXIV, sect. 1, n. 21 f.

27 Suarez, ib., n. 12 f.

28 C. 11, X, V, 38. Suarez, l. c., n. 16 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

city or town, and the church which is the only one in a town. In this latter clause a public oratory, which enjoys all the rights of a church,[29] is included among the privileged churches. Town may be taken in the sense of civil division, nor is any certain distance from one to another here indicated. The same cannot be said of semi-public and private oratories, which are therefore excluded from this prerogative, especially since the text adds: "in iisque solis," and this favor is intended for all the faithful, not for a privileged class only.[30]

b) The divine or sacred functions permitted are: the celebration of one Mass daily, under the restrictions mentioned below; the reservation of the Blessed Sacrament; the administration of Baptism with all its ceremonies and with sponsors; the administration of the holy Eucharist and of Penance; assistance at marriage, but without the nuptial blessing (which prohibition seems to exclude both blessings, that of the Ritual as well as that of the Missal); burial of the faithful, but excluding every solemnity, i. e., external pomp of any kind;[31] blessing of the baptismal water and the holy oils; preaching the word of God.

c) The restrictions governing all these sacred functions are: no chanting is allowed, no display of sacra supellex (although, of course, the liturgical colors must be used), no ringing of bells, no playing of organs or other musical instruments; and the holy Viaticum must be brought to the sick privately, as is customary in our country. Hence only a low Mass is permitted, without sacred ministers, and without benediction of the Blessed

29 See can. 1191, § 1.

30 This text corrects the old law of c. 24, 6°, V, 11; what Suarez, (l. c., n. 5 f.) and others, e. g., Hilarius a Sexten (l. c., p. 88) say, therefore, that private (sic!) oratories are included in this prerogative, is no longer tenable.

31 See can. 1204.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Sacrament. The exequies are to be performed in church according to the rubrics, but without the "Libera," and also without a funeral sermon.

The effects of a particular local interdict are enumerated as follows:

1. If an altar or chapel in a church has been interdicted, no sacred office or rite may be performed there; from this rule no exception is allowed, not even in favor of non-liturgical devotions, for the text is not restricted to divine offices.[32]

2. If a cemetery is interdicted, the bodies of the faithful may be buried there, but without any ecclesiastical rites; these rites may, however, be supplied after the interdict is raised.

3. If a specified church or oratory is interdicted, it makes a difference whether the sacred edifice is a conventual (capitular) or parochial one.

a) If the church belongs to a chapter, for instance, of canons or regulars who really form a chapter, ecclesiastical corporation, or convent,[33] the chapter may make use of the favor granted under can. 2271, n. 1, concerning the clergy, provided, however, (1.°) that the chapter is not under a personal interdict, and (2.°) that the text of the interdict does not order the conventual Mass to be celebrated and the canonical hours to be recited in another church or oratory.

b) If the church is a parochial one, canon 2271, n. 2, 32 A reasonable doubt as to our statement is likely to arise from the word sacer (ritus) which, if taken to mean liturgical, would not exclude private or non-liturgical devotions; yet we are inclined to take it in the wider sense of any sacred function.

33 The meaning is: those churches which form a chapter or convent with the obligation of a conventual Mass and choir service; see can. 610, § 1, 2, wherefore convents of Sisters who have no such obligation can not claim the privilege here granted.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google with all its favors and restrictions must be applied, unless the interdict expressly provides that another church is to be substituted for the one interdicted.

The material extent of local interdicts is explained in can. 2273 as follows:

1. If a city is laid under the interdict, the accessory or contributory places also are interdicted, including exempt places and the cathedral. This appears to be a rather wide interpretation and was expressly acknowledged as such by the Decretals,[34] where the reason is stated; viz., that interdicts be not vilified or contemned.

However, it may be justly doubted (we at least cannot read into the Decretal as much as others do)[35] whether this provision can be stretched to cover two different territories with different prelates. For instance, take Kansas City, Mo., and Kansas City, Kansas, or Brooklyn and New York, between which the river forms a line of demarkation dividing the two dioceses. Hence we suppose that the accessory premises or suburbs must belong to the same diocese. Thereby we do not, of course, mean to deny that the Apostolic See could formulate an interdict so as to include the accessories of a city situated in another diocese.

Exempt religious are included and must observe the interdict even if they live in the suburbs, unless they enjoy a special privilege. The cathedral is especially mentioned, because some authors, by reason of a Decretal,[36] exempt it from interdicts.

2. If a church is interdicted, the adjoining chapels also 34 C. 17, 6°, V, II.

35 Thus Suarez, l. c., disp. XXXII, sect. 2, n. 23 f.; but the cc. 17, 6°, V, II would not justify the assumption of Suarez.

36 C. 4, 6°, III, 4, which, however, as Suarez justly observes (l. c., n. 22), only speaks of benefices, not of favors granted to churches.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

are interdicted, but not the cemetery, even though adjoining.[37] The term contigua must be taken in its obvious sense, i. e., bordering on or touching the church with which they form one whole, even though perhaps a little space is left between them.

3. If a chapel is interdicted, the whole church is not interdicted, whether this chapel be in the church or adjoining it; for there may be a special reason for interdicting the chapel, and besides, no inference may be drawn from the minor to the major, from the accessory to the principal; accessorium sequitur principale, but not vice versa.

4. If a cemetery is interdicted, the adjoining church is not interdicted, even though it belongs to the cemetery; but all oratories erected on the cemetery are included.

We conclude with a remark concerning local interdicts. Canon 2271 mentions three conditions for the lawful use of the favors granted during the time of an interdict; but it omits to add another condition: "excommunicatis et interdictis exclusis," which occurs in the old law.[38] Hence it may safely be concluded that there is no obligation positively to exclude the excommunicated and interdicted, except in case of can. 2259, §2 and can. 2275, n. 1. However, the clergy should take care that the interdict is not violated through their coöperation.

EFFECTS OF A PERSONAL INTERDICT

Can. 2274

§1. Si communitas seu collegium delictum perpetraverit, interdictum ferri potest vel in singulas

37 Corrects c. 17, 6°, V, II.

38 See c. 25, X, V, 33; c. 24, 6°. V, II.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

personas delinquentes, vel in communitatem, uti talem, vel in personas delinquentes et in communitatem.

§2. Si primum, servetur praescriptum can. 2275.

§3. Si alterum, communitas seu collegium nequit ius ullum spirituale exercere quod ei competat.

§4. Si tertium, effectus cumulantur.

Can. 2275

Personaliter interdicti:

1°. Nequeunt divina officia celebrare eisve, excepta praedicatione verbi Dei, assistere; passive assistentes non est necesse ut expellantur; sed ab assistentia activa, quae aliquam secumferat participationem in divinis officiis celebrandis, repellantur interdicti post latam sententiam condemnatoriam vel declaratoriam, aut alioquin notorie interdicti;

2°. Prohibentur Sacramenta et Sacramentalia ministrare, conficere et recipere, ad norman can. 2260, §1, 2261.

3°. Praescripto can. 2265 etiam ipsi adstringuntur;

4°. Carent sepultura ecclesiastica ad normam can. 1240, §1, n. 2.

1°. It is evident that these two canons are related to each other, as both are concerned with the personal interdict. Since a personal interdict may be either general or special, can. 2274 considers the possible distinction between them, which is based upon the assumption that a personal interdict may be placed upon a body as such, or upon single members of that body. In the first case a censure can hardly be assumed;[39] whilst a special per-39 Hilarius a Sexten, l. c., p. 83, according to D'Annibale, I, n. 370.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sonal interdict in case of doubt, must be presumed to be a censure as per can. 2255, §2.

Communitas is a society less compactly organized, for instance, a parish, diocese, province.

Collegium is a more closely organized society or a corporation in the ecclesiastical and civil sense, as we say: tres faciunt collegium. Such are the cathedral and collegiate and monastic chapters, provided they have their own constitutions and enjoy autonomy (societas imperfecta). As stated above, modern laws presume that such communities and corporations are capable of committing a crime collectively, because they have a collective will. Consequently, they can also be punished collectively, and this is the fundamental supposition of an interdict.

The text says: 1.° An interdict may be placed upon single persons or members of a community or college which is found guilty of a punishable crime, and in this case the effects enumerated in can. 2275 follow. This is a special personal interdict.

2.° An interdict may be inflicted on a community or corporation as such, i. e., as a community or corporation, and in this case the community cannot exercise any spiritual right that belongs to it as a corporation or community. These rights are the capitular, collegiate, or corporate rights, in as far as they are spiritual, such as the right of election,[40] postulation, nomination, presentation, etc. Thus a chapter of canons who could otherwise elect the bishop or a vicar capitular,[41] is deprived of this right when under an interdict, provided a declaratory or condemnatory sentence has been issued.[42] The same is true 40 Cfr. c. 16, X, I, 6; can. 161; can. 167.

41 See can. 432.

42 See can. 167, § 1, n. 3. Bishops are not included in an interdict, either local or personal; see can. 2227, § 2; c. 4, 6°, V, II.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of a monastic chapter and a religious community. Neither could a parish choose its pastor, if this right belonged to the congregation according to can. 465.

Concerning our consultors, who ought to form some species of collegiate body, they scarcely have any truly spiritual rights, except that of electing the administrator, which would here certainly be concerned.[43] A collegiate body of judges who actually form a college according to can. 1576, is also included here.

3.° If the interdict has been imposed on individual delinquents and at the same time on the whole community, its effects are bulked, i. e., the interdict produces a double effect—one affecting the community as such, viz., privation of all corporate spiritual rights; the other affecting those personally interdicted (can. 2275). All this, of course, must be plainly expressed in the interdict itself, otherwise it may be presumed that the interdict is laid only upon the community as such (n. 2).

Those personally interdicted, i. e., individual members of a community or corporation, or others,[44] if interdicted, suffer the following penalties according to can. 2275:

1. They are not allowed to celebrate or assist at divine offices. Exception is made in favor of preaching, at which they may assist. It is not necessary to expel such personally interdicted persons from an assembly gathered for divine service, provided they merely assist and take no active part in the ceremony. On the other hand, such as have been interdicted by a declaratory or condemnatory sentence, or are otherwise notoriously interdicted, must be refused all active assistance, i. e., participation or coöperation in the celebration of the divine offices. From 43 See S. C. Cons., Feb. 22, 1919 (Eccl. Rev., Vol. 60, p. 532 f.); for Canada and Nova Scotia, S. C. Cons., May 8, 1919 (Eccl. Rev., Vol. 61, p. 165).

44 Cfr. can. 2328, can. 2356.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

this text we may conclude that personally interdicted individuals may be permitted, if necessary, to take some part in the divine service, for instance, by serving at Mass, as long as no declaratory sentence has been pronounced or the fact of their being interdicted is not notorious.[45]

2. They are forbidden to celebrate, administer, or receive any Sacraments or sacramentals according to can. 2260, §1, and can. 2261. Thus the faculties for hearing confessions are lost by an interdict after a declaratory or condemnatory sentence;[45a] also the right of assisting at marriages.[46]

Irregularity follows a violation of this law, according to can. 985, n. 7; the reception of orders at the hands of an interdicted bishop is punishable by suspension.[47]

3. Rights denied to excommunicated persons are also denied to interdicted persons to the extent stated in can. 2265.

4. Those under a personal interdict lose the right to a Christian burial, as explained in can. 1240, §1, n. 2.

No mention is made of actus legitimi, except as far as can. 2265 falls under that heading. Consequently other legal acts may be validly and licitly performed by one who is personally interdicted.

MITIGATION FOR THE PERSONALLY INNOCENT

Can. 2276

Qui interdicto locali vel interdicto in communitatem seu collegium subest, quin eidem causam dederit, nec

45 For instance, they are not known as the leaders of a faction against the Ordinary.

45a Can. 873, § 3; Can. 1095, § 1, n. 1.

46 Can. 1095, §1, n. 1.

47 Can. 2372; cfr. can. 2338, § 3; 2364.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

alia censura prohibeatur, potest, si sit rite dispositus, Sacramenta recipere, ad normam canonum praecedentium, sine absolutione ab interdicto aliave satisfactione.

Those who are laid under a local or personal interdict that concerns a community or corporation, but have not been the cause of that interdict, and are not otherwise censured, may receive the Sacraments according to the rules laid down in the preceding canons, provided they are properly disposed.

This favor is granted without any other satisfaction, and no absolution is required.

The term "causam dederit" [48] may give rise to doubts. Who causes an interdict, either local or personal? Suarez [49] justly observes that the culprit or delinquent must, in one way or another, be intimately connected with the place or community, so as to possess, rule or influence it. The pastor of a parish, or town, or city, is held responsible for the actions of his subjects; also kings and magistrates, especially in former days, were looked upon as responsible for the crimes committed in their respective territories. Concerning a community or corporation, a decision of a chapter would throw the burden on the whole body, because apparently approved by all. Here, then, the ringleaders would undoubtedly be those who provoked the interdict. That innocent persons sometimes suffer cannot be avoided, since the interdict is intended not so much as a punishment, but as a defence of the authority of the Church.

[48] C. 24, 6°, V, 11.

[49] De Cens., disp. XXXVI, sect. 3.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

THE INTERDICT FORBIDDING ONE TO ENTER A CHURCH

Can. 2277

Interdictum ab ingressu ecclesiae secumfert prohibitionem ne quis in ecclesia divina officia celebret vel eisdem assistat aut ecclesiasticam sepulturam habeat; si autem assistat, non est necesse ut expellatur, nec, si sepeliatur, oportet ut cadaver amoveatur.

As a species of personal[50] interdict is here mentioned that "ab ingressu ecclesiae," which occurs in the Decretals.[51] It may be inflicted upon laymen as well as clerics. Its effects are stated as follows:

1. Those so interdicted are forbidden to celebrate the divine offices in any church, even though it be not an interdicted church;

2. They are forbidden to assist at such offices, either passively or actively.

3. Ecclesiastical burial is denied them, i. e., they must be buried without solemnity and without the ecclesiastical rites which are performed in church. For no doubt the burial here intended is that in the church, according to can. 1205, §2, i. e., of civil and ecclesiastical princes and dignitaries, among them abbots.

This interdict does not, however, require that the interdicted person be expelled from a church where divine offices are being celebrated, or that these functions be interrupted or suspended on account of his presence. Neither does this interdict call for an exhumation of the corpse if such a person should have been buried in the church, either by fraud, violence, or ignorance.

50 Thus Suarez, l. c., disp. XXXV, sect. 4, n. 3.

51 See the "multum allegabile," c. 12, X, V, 38, concerning annual confession and Paschal Communion.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Art. III

SUSPENSION OR CLERICAL CENSURE

Suspension is a mitigation of the ancient penalty of deposition and degradation, which occurs as early as the third century.[1] Its fuller development, however, commenced in the fourth century, which witnessed quite a change in public discipline, including the application of penalties to clerical offenders; removal from office, but not from the clerical ranks; privation of certain spiritual [2] and material rights; ineligibility for higher offices, whilst the bishops were denied intercourse with their fellow bishops.[3] When, in the sixth and later centuries, benefices were introduced and multiplied, it was natural that the revenues should play a conspicuous part as means of reaching delinquent clerics. Hence towards the end of the XIIth century we find a suspension from benefices beside and distinct from suspension from the exercise of orders and offices.[4] This is the status of suspension in the Decretals, to which the Council of Trent only added the suspension ex informata conscientia.[5] The Code has not simplified suspension.

Yet some progress is noticeable, especially as far as precision of terms and definition of the effects of different kinds of suspension are concerned.

1 See Kober, Die Suspension der Kirchendiener, 1862, p. 19 ff.; Hinschius, K.-R., IV, 747 ff.; "ab ordine depositus"; Syn. Aurel. III, c. 19.

2 For instance, prohibition to say Mass for a certain time, v. g., six months; Syn. Aurel. III, c. 6, 18.

3 Syn. Aurel. III, c. 6 (l. c.,): "ab omnium fratrum caritate."

4 See c. 2, X, II, 20; c. 7, X, V, 19; c. 7, X, I, 6.

5 Sess. 14, c. 1, de ref.; see can. 2186.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

NATURE AND DISTINCTION

Can. 2278

§1. Suspensio est censura qua clericus officio vel beneficio vel utroque prohibetur.

§2. Etiam suspensionis effectus separari queunt; sed nisi aliud constet, in suspensione generaliter lata comprehenduntur omnes effectus qui in canonibus huius articuli enumerantur; contra, in suspensione ab officio vel a beneficio omnes tantum effectus alterutrius speciei.

1. Suspension is a censure by which a cleric is forbidden to exercise the rights attached to his office or benefice, or both.

In as far as it is a censure, suspension must bear the marks and conditions of censures in general.

Suspension differs from excommunication in this that it concerns clerics only, and its effects are separable in various degrees. Suspension differs from an interdict in that its effects are strictly limited to clerical rights, leaving the spiritual benefits common to all Christians, such as ecclesiastical burial, untouched.

2. Since the effects of suspension are separable, it is evident that they follow the various kinds of suspension in varying degrees.

a) A general suspension deprives a cleric of all the rights pertaining to his office as well as his benefice; and if the suspension is not further determined in the decree or precept of the superior or judge,[6] a general

6 As a censure it may be inflicted by a judiciary sentence or in virtue of a special precept; see 1933, § 4; on provisional suspension, see can. 2222, § 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google suspension is to be understood, i. e., one accompanied by all the effects stated in this article.

c) A special suspension is twofold: from office or from benefice. The special suspension from office may be either total or partial, according as all the rights attached to the office, or some only, are taken away. The special suspension from benefice, too, may be total or partial, since the administration of the benefice may be taken away or only its revenues.

The distinction of latae and ferendae sententiae also applies to suspension. But the distinction between a suspensus vitandus and toleratus has no foundation in the Code.

EFFECTS OF SUSPENSION

Can. 2279

§1. Suspensio ab officio simpliciter, nulla adiecta limitatione, vetat omnem actum tum potestatis ordinis et iurisdictionis, tum etiam merae administrationis ex officio competentis, excepta administratione bonorum proprii beneficii.

§2. Suspensio:

1.° A iurisdictione generatim, vetat omnem actum potestatis iurisdictionis pro utroque foro tam ordinariae quam delegatae;

2.° A divinis, omnem actum potestatis ordinis quam quis sive per sacram ordinationem sive per privilegium obtinet;

3.° Ab ordinibus, omnem actum potestatis ordinis receptae per ordinationem;

4.° A sacris ordinibus, omnem actum potestatis ordinis receptae per ordinationem in sacris;

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

5.° A certo et definito ordine exercendo, omnem actum ordinis designati; suspensus autem prohibetur insuper eundem ordinem conferre et superiorem recipere receptumque post suspensionem exercere;

6.° A certo et definito ordine conferendo, ipsum ordinem conferre, non vero inferiorem nec superiorem;

7.° A certo et definito ministerio, ex. gr., audiendi confessiones, vel officio, ex. gr., cum cura animarum, omnem actum eiusdem ministerii vel officii;

8.° Ab ordine pontificali, omnem actum potestatis ordinis episcopalis;

9.° A pontificalibus, exercitium actuum pontificalium, ad normam can. 337, §2.

Can. 2280

§1. Suspensio a beneficio privat fructibus beneficii, excepta habitatione in aedibus beneficialibus, non autem iure administrandi bona beneficialia, nisi decretum vel sententia suspensionis ipsam administrandi potestatem suspenso expresse adimat et alii tribuat.

§2. Si, quamvis censura obstet, beneficiarius fructus percipiat, fructus restituere debet et ad hanc restitutionem cogi potest canonicis quoque, si opus sit, sanctionibus.

A suspension may be inflicted on individual clerics or on a body of clerics as a corporation.

1. The effects of special suspension from office are mentioned in can. 2279, §1. It is evident from can. 145 that office is to be taken in the strict sense, i. e., for a charge, either divinely or ecclesiastically established, conveying some of the power of order or jurisdiction,—supposing, of course, the clerical character, at least the tonsure. All temporal rights, such as administration, are included only in so far as they are strictly connected with the spiritual office.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

If, therefore, suspension from office is inflicted without any further restriction,[7] it forbids the exercise of any act of the power of order or jurisdiction, and of mere administration attached to the office itself. But the administration of one's benefice is not withdrawn. Besides, it should be noted that the office itself is not lost, for the effect touches only the exercise of rights. Consequently, a suspended priest cannot lawfully say Mass, or administer the Sacraments, except as far as canons 2284 and 2261 permit (of which see below). Neither can a suspended prelate grant indulgences or inflict censures, under the same restriction (i. e., can. 2284), for these are acts of jurisdiction.

As to acts of administration accruing to the office itself, such are mentioned under can. 262; 691, §1; 1489; 1520 f. Thus the administrators and rectors of pious associations, provided they are clergymen, lose the right of administration if suspended. Exception is made of the administration of one's own benefice, which means that a pastor may retain control of the revenues of his benefice. But if suspended, he could not administer the benefice of another pastor. Assistance at marriage is invalid only after a declaratory or condemnatory sentence,[8] or according to can. 2284.

Since, however, a suspension from office may be only partial,— which fact should be duly stated in the decree or sentence,— the Code distinguishes various degrees or cases of suspension from office.

7 For instance, if the bishop should say: "I hereby suspend you from your office," the office which the addressed cleric holds is meant.

8 See can. 1095, § 1, n. 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1. Suspension from jurisdiction (a iurisdictione), in general, forbids the exercise of every act of ordinary as well as delegated power of jurisdiction in the external and internal forum; hence every grant of faculties or indulgences made by a superior thus suspended is forbidden, nay, may even be invalid, according to can. 2284, also every exercise of judiciary or administrative power and every act of preaching or teaching is forbidden; and from the moment the suspension takes effect every delegation is ineffective.[9]

2. Suspension a divinis forbids every act of the power of order which one may have received in virtue either of sacred ordination or of a privilege. Hence all acts based upon the power of order are forbidden, e. g., the administration of Sacraments and sacramentals, the celebration of holy Mass, and all the acts of order which one may exercise in virtue of a special indult or privilege, such as conferring minor orders, confirmation, consecration or blessings.[10]

3. Suspension from orders (ab ordinibus) forbids every act of the power of orders received by ordination. Consequently this more general prohibition includes what is specifically stated under n. 4. But powers granted by privilege or indult, e. g., that of conferring minor orders, are not included in this prohibition.

4. Suspension from sacred orders (a sacris ordinibus) forbids every act of the power of sacred or higher orders, i. e., from subdeaconship onward (can. 949).

5. Suspension from exercising a certain specified order (a certo et definito ordine exercendo) forbids only the exercise of that order. But the cleric thus suspended is 9 Attention should, however, be called to can. 209.

10 See can. 951; can. 782; can. 1147, § 1;—but no privilege is involved in can. 964.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

not allowed to confer or to receive a higher order, nor to exercise a higher order after suspension. Thus a priest suspended from the priesthood may not say Mass or impart the blessings reserved to priests, but he may impart the blessings which deacons can give. This is also true of blessings which he may impart by a special indult.[11] Thus a priest under such a suspension may lawfully distribute holy Communion, since deacons may perform this function; he may also confer Baptism, but not solemnly.[12] But a priest thus suspended may not licitly be promoted to the episcopate, or, if promoted, exercise episcopal functions. A bishop suspended from the exercise of the episcopal order cannot licitly consecrate a bishop. But a bishop suspended from the priestly order may exercise and confer all orders, with the sole exception of the sacerdotal order.

6. Suspension from conferring a certain and specified order (a certo et definito ordine conferendo) forbids administering only that order and none other, either higher or lower.

7. Suspension from a certain and specified ministry or office (a certo et definito ministerio vel officio) forbids the exercise of acts attached to that specific ministry or office. Thus if a confessor, teacher, or preacher is suspended, it means that he cannot hear confessions, or teach in an ecclesiastical capacity, or preach the word of God.[13] If a chancellor is suspended, it signifies that he cannot exercise these offices as long as the suspension lasts;[14] if a priest is suspended from the care of souls, every act con-

11 Can. 1147, n. 1, 2–4. For the necessary order is not lost, neither is the indult taken away by suspension of n. 5.

12 Can. 742, § 2.

13 See can. 2317.

14 See can. 373, § 5.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

nected with that office is forbidden, such as hearing confessions, visiting the sick, etc.[15]

8. Suspension ab ordine pontificali forbids the exercise of acts belonging to the episcopal order, e. g., the conferring of orders, Confirmation, the consecration of churches or altars, etc.[16]

9. Suspension a pontificalibus forbids the exercise of pontifical acts for which mitre and crozier are required according to the liturgical laws; for these two emblems always go together.[17] Is this suspension identical with the preceding one? It would seem that if all acts proper to the episcopal order are comprised by the name pontificals, as Thesaurus and Benedict XIV expressly state,[18] the difference seems to be very slight. Thus Thesaurus says: Among these acts are enumerated: the conferring of orders,[19] the consecration of sacred vessels, churches, virgins, and chrism, Confirmation, blessing of vestments and corporals, sacerdotal acts usually performed with mitre and crozier; also the conferring of the tonsure. Some of these acts belong strictly to the episcopal order, viz.: the conferring of holy orders, Confirmation and consecration. How, then, is n. 8 to be distinguished from n. 9? Reference to can. 337, §2 does not solve the difficulty. To us it seems that by acts of the episcopal order are understood all acts which require, at least per se, the episcopal character; whilst the term "pontificals" includes purely ceremonial functions, or, as Thesaurus says, the priestly acts performed with mitre and crozier.

15 See can. 462, 464, 892.

16 See can. 951; 782, § 1; 1147, § 1.

17 Caeremoniale Episcop., l. I, c. 17, nn. 4, 8.

18 De Poenis Eccl., P. II, c. 5 (ed. cit., p. 180); Bened. XIV, "Ad audientiam," Feb. 15, 1753, § 8.

19 Bened. XIV, l. c., distinctly adds: also of minor orders.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

If this should be too restrictive, it may also be said, without doing violence to the text, that n. 9 comprises all acts performed with mitre and crozier, and therefore is more comprehensive than n. 8. The former interpretation appears more probable because it clearly distinguishes the two suspensions and minimizes the penalty.[20]

10. Suspension from benefice is the subject of can. 2280. By benefice is understood a juridical entity established by competent authority, consisting of an office and the right to receive the revenues attached to the same. As insinuated elsewhere,[21] there may be a doubt as to our country and other countries where benefices in the sense attached to that term before the promulgation of the Code are almost unknown. However, it appears that the wider range of endowment and the less strictly defined subjective perpetuity of beneficiaries clearly perceptible in the Code render it necessary to apply the term benefice to our parishes, as our pastors actually hold canonical parishes in the sense of the Code. Besides, there can hardly be any doubt that, even in our country, the income or salary of the pastor can be really distinguished from the office he holds. This suffices to assume that the term fructus beneficii comprises all the revenues accruing from an office which one holds. Consequently, suspension from benefice is applicable also to our country and other countries similarly situated.

The effect of suspension from benefice consists in privation of the fruits or revenues of the benefice. By this name (fructus beneficii) is understood all the material

20 There is only one difficulty: Are abbots, if suspended a pontificalibus, allowed to confer tonsure and minor orders on their own subjects? The answer should be affirmative; although we really doubt it, because the two emblems are, according to the Pont. Rom., required, and abbots do not possess the episcopal order.

21 See Vol. VI, can. 1411.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

or temporal income derived from the benefice, whether in specie or natural offerings, tithes, interest, produce, etc. Not included in these are manual Mass stipends, (to some extent) daily distributions,[22] much less patrimonial and quasi-patrimonial possessions, revenues which were due at the moment the suspension was incurred, pensions, government subsidies.

Our Code exempts from these fruits:

a) the dwelling or living in the residence of the beneficiary, i. e., the actual accupation of the parsonage for the purpose of dwelling therein: this can in nowise be taken away from the clergyman, even though he be suspended by a declaratory or condemnatory sentence;

b) the right of administering the benefice, which means that he can continue to perform all legal acts required for the lawful administration, improvement, and safeguarding of his benefice.[23] However, this right, says the Code, may be taken away by a decree or sentence and given to another. But the decree or sentence must expressly state this fact. If the suspended cleric himself administers the benefice, he is entitled to an adequate remuneration for his expenses and labor.[24]

§2 of can. 2280 obliges a cleric suspended from his benefice to make restitution of the fruits received during the time of suspension. He has unjustly acquired something to which he was not entitled.[25] Therefore, says the text, if he should refuse to make restitution, he may be compelled to do so by penal measures, even censures, if

22 Cfr. can. 394 f.; but to some extent daily distributions may constitute a benefice as per can. 1410; thus also stole fees (but not in our country, where the stole fees are properly distinguished from salary).

23 The old law also took away this right; cc. 1, 16, 6°, I, 6.

24 Cfr. Hilarius a Sexten, l. c., p. 73.

25 Suarez, De Cens., disp. XXVII, sect. 1, n. 7.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

necessary. It is evident that, since a benefice is considered to be a juridical entity, restitution must be made to the very benefice or to the church to which it is attached. Neither can a suspended cleric dispose of the revenues at will. The obligation in conscience is retroactive up to the moment when the censure was incurred, though with the benefit mentioned in can. 2232, §1.

Since suspension from a benefice is adequately distinguished from suspension from an office, it follows that the acts forbidden to one suspended from office are not the same as those forbidden in virtue of suspension from a benefice. Consequently, not only the rights, but also the duties, attached to the office remain intact, even though the remuneration may fail. This punishment was intended, that the delinquent may, by receding from contumacy, obtain absolution and rehabilitation. But the fruits lost during the time of suspension cannot be reclaimed, unless the sentence has been declared invalid or its unjustice becomes manifest afterwards.[26]

EXTENT OF SUSPENSION

Can. 2281

Suspensio generaliter lata vel suspensio _ab officio_ aut _a beneficio_ afficit omnia officia aut beneficia, quae clericus habet in dioecesi Superioris suspendentis, nisi aliud appareat.

Can. 2282

Loci Ordinarius nequit clericum suspendere a determinato officio vel beneficio quod in aliena dioecesi [26] Suarez, l. c., disp. XXVII, sect. 2, n. 6; Wernz, l. c., VI, n. 211, p. 220.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

reperiatur; sed suspensio latae sententiae, iure communi irrogata, afficit omnia officia vel beneficia in quacunque dioecesi possideantur.

Can. 2283

Quae de excommunicatione can. 2265 statuuntur, etiam suspensioni sunt applicanda.

There is implied in the first two canons a distinction which is common to all censures, viz.: a iure and ab homine, either ferendae or latae sententiae (see can. 2217). Besides this, another distinction is hinted at, viz.: that between ius commune and ius particulare. Both may again be latae or ferendae sententiae. Thus a particular community may enact suspension ipso iure, i. e., particulari; and the Ordinary, or judge, or religious superior of an exempt organization may also inflict a sentence of suspension (ab homine, ferendae sententiae). The suspensions iure communi irrogatae are contained in the Code, and besides these, no others of common law are to be heeded (can. 6, n. 5). Thereby, of course, the supreme legislator or a general council is not bound, in the sense that they could not, iure communi, either decree or inflict a suspension not contained in the Code.

The general principle, "Extra territorium jus dicenti impune non paretur" [27] is applicable here, provided the distinction between common and particular law be duly noted.

1. A suspension that is generally worded and inflicted, concerns all offices and benefices which the cleric holds in the diocese of the superior who inflicts the suspension from office or benefice, unless the contrary is evident.

[27] C. 2, 6°, I, 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This general suspension does not apply outside the diocese, for it is supposed to be inflicted either by a particular law or by the superior, ab homine. Consequently if one holds an office or benefice in a strange diocese, the exercise of that office or benefice would not be curtailed by such a general suspension. The contrary intention would have to be made known by the Ordinary of the strange diocese.[28]

2. A total suspension from office comprises all the offices — but not the benefices — one holds in the diocese of the superior who inflicts the suspension, unless the contrary is apparent.

3. A total suspension from benefice extends to all the benefices—but not to all the offices—one holds in the diocese of the superior who suspends, unless, again, the contrary intention of the superior is obvious.

4. The local Ordinary, according to can. 2282, cannot suspend a clergyman from a specified office or benefice that belongs to another diocese. For this suspension supposes either a particular law or a sentence inflicted by the superior, the effect of which cannot be extended to the territory where the jurisdiction of the suspending superior ceases.[29] The contrary opinion held by some is, therefore, wrong.[30]

5. A suspension latae sententiae inflicted by common law, iure communi, affects all offices and benefices, no matter in what diocese the suspended cleric may hold them. Of course, this suspension is here supposed to be general and total without restriction.[31]

28 See c. 37, 6°, I, 6: a suspension of three years inflicted ipso iure, yet binding only for the diocese for which the compromissarii elected an indignus, not for the benefices he held in a strange diocese.

29 Ballerini-Palmieri, l. c., Vol. VII, n. 501 ff.; p. 284 ff.; Wernz, l. c. VI, n. 208, p. 215.

30 This opinion was held by Suarez and Thesaurus, cfr. Wernz, l. c.

31 Ballerini-Palmieri, l. c.; Wernz l. c.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

According to the common opinion of canonists, a cleric suspended ab ordine is obliged to observe the suspension everywhere, because suspension is a personal penalty which the common law desires and demands to see respected.[32] Since in the suspension ab ordine is included the suspension ab officio or a divinis, it follows that a cleric suspended from office, or a divinis, even though suspended only ab homine, or by a particular law, cannot exercise his order anywhere. Consequently, can. 2280, as stated above, must be understood as follows: The suspension ab officio inflicted by a diocesan superior must be observed in the diocese and elsewhere, and the suspension ab ordine is implicitly included in the suspension ab officio. Otherwise we should have to give up the teaching of the school, stated above, that suspension ab o dine obliges everywhere, and simply state that suspension, unless decreed or inflicted by common law, is merely local, i. e., diocesan.

It may be asked: How can one suspended ab officio in diocese A, and holding an office in diocese B, where he is not suspended, exercise his office in diocese B, since the exercise of the power of order is taken away from him by his superior? The answer is that the effects are separable, and therefore jurisdiction is not taken away in diocese B. Besides, what one cannot do by himself, he may do through a substitute, and a benefice is not affected by suspension from office.

Can. 2283, perhaps too briefly, applies the effects of excommunication also to suspension. The suspended cleric loses the active and passive voice and cannot be promoted to orders, as stated in can. 2265 with regard to excommunication. This is quite clear. But not so 32 Ballerini-Palmieri, l. c., n. 502, p. 285.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

evident is the answer to the question whether the legislator means to attach these effects only to general suspension. Ancient [33] as well as modern commentators disagree on this point. A modern writer says: "Some canonists held, against the common opinion, that these effects are produced only by general suspensions from benefice; but the present law does not distinguish, and assimilates suspended clerics to excommunicated ones in this matter." [34] Therefore, according to this author, the effects enumerated in can. 2265 follow each and every kind of suspension, because the law does not distinguish. But this reasoning is not exactly to the point. For can. 2278, §2 does distinguish between various suspensions, and only to the suspensio generaliter lata must be applied all the effects enumerated in article III, ch. II, title VIII of this fifth book. Hence the argument ex silentio proves nothing in this matter. There is also an essential distinction between excommunication and suspension, because the effects of the former, unlike the effects of the latter, are inseparable. Therefore, only a general suspension can be assimilated to excommunication, but never a special one, be it total or partial. Besides, since penalties must be interpreted benignly and, if the text is obscure, the least must be assumed,[35] we cannot help accepting the interpretation that general suspension only is accompanied by the effects mentioned in can. 2265. A last observation may confirm this statement. Can. 2265 commences with quilibet excommunicatus, every excommunicated person. Analogously we should say in can.

33 Wernz, l. c., VI, n. 209, p. 216, calls the opinion which holds that every suspension produces the effects mentioned in can. 2265, communior, although he himself does not share it.

34 Ayrinhac, l. c., p. 149; V. Cappello, l. c., p. 167 is silent; Eishmann, l. c., p. 104, accepts the view of Wernz.

35 See Reg. Iuris 49, 30, in 6°.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2283: every suspended cleric — which would mean, concretely speaking, that every cleric suspended ab ordine pontificali, a pontificalibus, or a divinis would also lose the active and passive voice.[36] This sounds untenable and improbable, and consequently we hold that, in can. 2283, only a general suspension is intended, i. e., one worded and inflicted in general terms, comprising office and benefice, to the exclusion of every special suspension, either total or partial.[37]

MITIGATION OF THE EFFECTS

Can. 2284

Si incursa fuerit censura suspensionis quae vetat administrationem Sacramentorum et Sacramentalium, servetur praescriptum can. 2261; si censura suspensionis quae prohibet actum iurisdictionis in foro seu interno seu externo, actus est invalidus, ex. gr., absolutio sacramentalis, si lata sit sententia condemnatoria vel declaratoria, aut Superior expresse declaret se ipsam iurisdictionis potestatem revocare; secus est illicitus tantum, nisi a fidelibus petitus fuerit ad normam mem. can. 2261, §2.

Here the modification stated in can. 2261 is extended to suspension.

1. If a suspension is incurred that forbids the administration of Sacraments and sacramentals, as is the case in suspensions ab officio and a divinis, the suspended cleric

36 The loss of the active voice was not denied by Schmalzgrueber; V, tit. 39, n. 298.

37 The texts quoted in Card. Gasparri's edition for can. 2283 mention suspension, but leave it doubtful whether a general or special suspension had been incurred; this is especially the case with c. 8, X, I, 4. We do not, however, deny that the text apparently favors the opinion rejected above.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

may lawfully administer them only in case he is legitimately requested by the faithful; nor is he obliged in this case to ask for the reason of the demand. This favor, however, supposes that no condemnatory or declaratory sentence has been pronounced against him. For after such a sentence the faithful could not lawfully demand of him the administration of the Sacraments or sacramentals, nor could he lawfully accede to the request, except in case of danger of death, when other ministers were wanting.

2. When the suspension, e. g., ab officio, a iurisdictione, a definito et certo ministerio (audiendi confessiones) forbids an act of jurisdiction either in the internal or external forum, the act performed under such censure is invalid, if a condemnatory or declaratory sentence has been pronounced or if the superior has expressly declared that the power of jurisdiction is withdrawn; but if no such sentence or such express declaration has been made, the act of jurisdiction is valid, even though illicit. Nay, it even becomes lawful if the minister has been legitimately asked by the faithful. In danger of death the act of jurisdiction which is exercised in the form of sacramental absolution is valid and licit, even though other priests or ministers are available (can. 2261).

SUSPENSION OF COMMUNITIES

Can. 2285

§1. Si communitas seu collegium clericorum delictum commiserit, suspensio ferri potest vel in singulas personas delinquentes vel in communitatem, uti talem, vel in personas delinquentes et communitatem.

§2. Si primum, serventur huius articuli canones.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§3. Si alterum, communitas prohibetur exercitio iurium spiritualium quae ipsi, uti communitati, competunt.

§4. Si tertium, effectus cumulantur.

History proves that a community may be suspended.[38] That it is juridically possible follows from the fact that a community, as such, may be guilty of crimes and, consequently, liable to punishment. Special rights are attached to corporate bodies and may be suspended for a time. As a crime (for instance, appropriation or embezzlement of church property or disobedience to lawful authority) may be perpetrated by single members of a community, as members, or by the community as such (for instance, by a capitular decree), or by single members and the community simultaneously, it follows that a community or corporation can be suspended in three different ways.

1. If single members of a community (also male religious[39]) are suspended, all the effects which that suspension involves, follow, and therefore what has been stated in connection with canons 2278-2284 must here be applied.

2. If the community or corporation as such is suspended, all its spiritual corporate rights, i. e., spiritual rights which the community as such enjoys, are suspended. To this class belong especially the rights of 38 Cathedral, collegiate, and religious chapters, sede vacante, proved detrimental to the property of the prelates or church, and were therefore suspended; c. 40, 6°, I, 6; c. un. 6°, III, 8.

39 Of female chapters the Canon Law says nothing, although some abbesses overstepped the limits of their power, examples of which may be found in c. 10, X, V, 38; c. 12, X, I, 33, in which latter chapter an abbess is said to have suspended her clerics from office and benefice. Neither are female religious suspended.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google election, presentation, nomination; also, we presume, that of corporate representation at processions, and therefore also the right of precedence. All these are suspended (see can. 2275); but the right to administer property is not stopped. It also appears logical to deny the right of exercising pontifical functions, if such belong to a suspended community.

3. If single members and the community as such are suspended, the effects are bulked, according to can. 2275.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE IX

VINDICTIVE PENALTIES

Can. 2286

Poenae vindicativae illae sunt, quae directe ad delicti expiationem tendunt ita ut earum remissio e cessatione contumaciae delinquentis non pendeat.

Can. 2287

Ab inflictis poenis vindicativis datur appellatio seu recursus in suspensivo, nisi aliud expresse in iure caveatur.

Can. 2288

Exceptis poenis degradationis, depositionis, privationis officii aut beneficii, et nisi urgeat necessitas reparandi scandalum, prudentiae iudicis remittitur, si reus talis sit ut prima vice post vitam laudabiliter peractam deliquerit, poenae ordinariae per sententiam condemnatoriam inflictae exsecutionem suspendere, ea tamen conditione ut, si reus intra proximum triennium aliud delictum eiusdem vel alterius generis commiserit, poenam utrique delicto debitam luat.

Can. 2289

Poena vindicativa finitur eius expiatione vel dispensatione ab eo concessa qui legitimam habeat dispensandi potestatem ad norman can. 2236.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Can. 2290

§1. In casibus occultis urgentioribus, si ex observatione poenae vindicativae latae sententiae, reus seipsum proderet cum infamia et scandalo, quilibet confessarius potest in foro sacramentali obligationem servandae poenae suspendere, iniuncto onere recurrendi saltem intra mensem per epistolam et per confessarium, si id fieri possit sine gravi incommodo, reticito nomine, ad S. Poenitentiariam vel ad Episcopum facultate praeditum et standi eius mandatis.

§2. Et si in aliquo casu extraordinario hic recursus sit impossibilis, tunc ipsemet confessarius potest dispensationem concedere ad normam can. 2254, §3.

Every society is instituted for the welfare of its members, but also for the sake of its own existence and weal. This lies in the nature of society. The Church, too, must necessarily provide for the salvation of souls, this being her supreme law. But as a human society consists of men, not of angels, it is evident that the Church has to wield a sword in order to exact obedience if other means fail. This privilege belongs to her as an autonomous society. Self-respect and self-preservation prescribe means that savor of atonement and public reparation. Such means are called vindictive penalties, because their primary end is to avenge the public order. It is not necessary to recall the penitential system, which had very much of a public character up to the twelfth century. Neither is it necessary to remind the reader of the historical fact that, during the time of religious union, the vindictive measures were more numerous and more effectively enforced than now, and that in the course of later centuries they became fewer and more spiritualized. Still the present number is far from insignificant.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1. Vindictive penalties, says can. 2286, are intended directly for the expiation of crimes, and consequently their relaxation does not depend on the mere cessation of contumacy. The reason for this statement has been given above. These penalties are called vindictive because their object is to avenge the social and juridical order of the Church. They are penalties because inflicted by lawful authority by way of privation, as plainly appears in all the penalties enumerated in canons 2291 and 2298.

Note that vindictive penalties may be either latae or ferendae sententiae. Those latae sententiae require no judiciary trial.[1] A declaratory sentence is indeed required, i. e., one to ascertain the criminal fact, but this does not mean that the delinquent would not be obliged to execute the sentence on himself if he knew himself to be guilty of a crime on which the law puts a certain penalty. Can. 2232, § 1, expressly says that vindictive penalties have the same obligation attached to them as corrective penalties. There are, however, exceptions to this self-execution; see can. 2290.

2. Appeal or recourse from vindictive penalties is admitted, and this appeal has a suspensive, not merely a devolutive effect, unless the law contains an express provision to the contrary. This, of course, must be understood of such penalties as are inflicted ab homine or a iure, but ferendae sententiae; because when the law

1 Can. 2223 f. and can. 2290, § 1 distinctly mention a vindictive penalty latae sententiae; wherefore we cannot agree with Eichmann, l. c., p. 109, that vindictive penalties can be inflicted only after a trial; see also Thesaurus-Giraldi, l. c., p. 1, c. 5, p. 5, who admits such a penalty latae sententiae; especially ineligibility for office.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

declares a penalty to be incurred ipso iure,[2] there is no recourse or appeal with suspensive effect possible.[3] The suspensive effect, to repeat what was said before, means that, pending the recourse or appeal, the delinquent is not bound to consider or to conduct himself as convicted or guilty, either in the internal or in the external forum.

3. Suspension of the sentence is a mitigation introduced in legal terms by the Code. It may be called a conditional pardon, such as is granted by judges on condition of good behaviour in future, and has been used in civil codes.[4] In our can. 2288 it is called a suspension of the execution of a condemnatory sentence by which an ordinary penalty is inflicted. An ordinary penalty is one which is determined in law or by custom[5] and does not exceed the proportion of imputability, scandal, and damage (see can. 2218). The judge may prudently apply this benefit of the law to a delinquent who had led an irreproachable life before, but now has committed a punishable crime for the first time. Suspension of sentence

a) Is a conditional suspension or pardon, for if the delinquent commits the same or a different crime within three years (from date of the conditional pardon) he has to pay the penalty originally decreed as well as the penalty determined for the new crime. But the suspended penalty is not retroactive; or, at least the text is silent about its retroactive character.

b) The benefit of conditional pardon cannot be applied by the judge if: 1°. the penalty of degradation, deposition, privation from office or benefice has been inflicted, or 2 See can. 2343, § 1, n. 2: est ipso iure infamis.

3 Thesaurus-Giraldi, l. c., p. 39; p. 1, c. 25.

4 Thus the Regolamento of Gregory XVI, art. 36, § 4; art. 49; Wernz, l. c., VI, n. 85, p. 93.

5 Schmalzgruber, V, 37, n. 11.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

if 2°. there is need of repairing public scandal, because vindictive penalties are intended for the maintenance of the public order.

4. Cessation of penalties. Since the object just mentioned can be obtained by atonement or expiation, it is evident that, if satisfaction is made, the penalty should cease. This is readily understood if the penalty was a fixed one, as happens when a fine is imposed, or if the penalty is limited to a certain time, after the lapse of which it ceases.[6] Prescription cannot be alleged, inasmuch as criminal action only, not penalty, is liable to prescription.[7] But in many cases expiation has a relative meaning, which depends upon the acceptance of the ecclesiastical authority, who must decide whether atonement is sufficient.

Therefore, besides expiation, can. 2289 mentions a more specific manner of releasing the penalty; viz.: by dispensation. As dispensation in general is a relaxation of the law, so here it is the remission of a penal law or sentence. Such a relaxation can proceed only from the authority which has the power to enact penal laws or inflict vindictive penalties.[8] This, however, must be judged according to can. 2236. Consequently:

a) A dispensation can be granted only by the prelate who inflicted the penalty and, therefore, a penalty inflicted by common law can be remitted only by the Pope; a penalty inflicted by a particular law or statute can be remitted by the one who enacted that particular law,

6 Thesaurus-Giraldi, l. c., p. 41.

7 See can. 1703–1705.

8 Of little practical value is the distinction between absolution and dispensation, as if the former proceeded from the judiciary, the latter from the legislative power (thus Hollweck, l. c., p. 141 according to Thesaurus-Giraldi, l. c., p. 21); yet there is a difference between the two, inasmuch as absolution is an act of justice (actus iustitiae), whereas dispensation is a favor (actus gratiae).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

i. e., concretely speaking, by the local Ordinary,[9] or in the case of exempt religious communities, by the competent superior who enjoys this power according to the constitutions.

b) A penalty inflicted by a superior ab homine can be dispensed with by himself;

c) And, since the successor in office has equal power, he, too, can dispense; the same, of course, is to be said of delegates.

d) But a judge who merely applies the penal law or precept cannot dispense from penalties, since his office ceases with the sentence and his power is thereby exhausted.[10]

All other extensions of these principles, proposed by authors,[11] must be limited to the rules stated above; but the Code has adopted some of the modifications providing for urgent cases (see can. 81).

5. Extended power is given to confessors for more urgent occult cases. What occult or secret crimes are has been explained in can. 2197, 4°. This power is limited as follows:

a) It is not only conditioned upon secrecy and urgency, but the observance of the vindictive penalty, which is supposed to be latae sententiae, must, at least probably, cause the loss of good name to the delinquent and scandal to the people. Of the existence of this condition the petitioner may judge, and his testimony must be believed. Take, e. g., suspension from office for a certain time, or refusal to accept a dignity offered, of which the confessor might know nothing.

9 Not by the metropolitan, nor even by the Apostolic Delegate, unless the latter has obtained delegated power; but his delegation generally concerns only matters a iure, not ab homine.

10 Wernz, l. c., VI, n. 88 f.; p. 93.

11 Thesaurus-Giraldi, l. c., p. 29 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

b) The power granted to confessors is limited also in this sense, that the confessor in the confessional—therefore not merely in foro interno—can only suspend the obligation of observing the vindictive penalty imposed by law, and must hold the penitent to the duty of having recourse to the proper authority in writing, through the confessor, within one month from the date of confession, if this can be done without serious inconvenience. This recourse must be had, without mentioning names, to the S. Poenitentiaria or to the bishop, if he enjoys the necessary faculties. The penitent must then abide by their orders.

c) If in an extraordinary case recourse is impossible, the confessor is empowered to grant the dispensation, according to can. 2254, §3.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER I

VINDICTIVE PENALTIES COMMON TO ALL THE FAITHFUL

Can. 2291

Poenae vindicativae quae omnes fideles pro delictorum gravitate afficere possunt, in Ecclesia praesertim sunt:

1°. Interdictum locale et interdictum in communitatem seu collegium in perpetuum vel ad tempus praefinitum vel ad beneplacitum Superioris;

2°. Interdictum ab ingressu ecclesiae in perpetuum vel ad tempus praefinitum vel ad beneplacitum Superioris;

3°. Poenalis translatio vel suppressio sedis episcopalis vel paroecialis;

4°. Infamia iuris;

5°. Privatio sepulturae ecclesiasticae, ad normam can. 1240, §1;

6°. Privatio Sacramentalium;

7°. Privatio vel suspensio ad tempus pensionis quae ab Ecclesia vel ex bonis Ecclesiae solvitur, vel alius iuris seu privilegii ecclesiastici;

8°. Remotio ab actibus legitimis ecclesiasticis exercendis;

9°. Inhabilitas ad gratias ecclesiasticas aut munia in Ecclesia quae statum clericalem non requirant, vel ad gradus academicos auctoritate ecclesiastica consequendos;

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

10°. Privatio vel suspensio ad tempus muneris, facultatis vel gratiae iam obtentae;

11°. Privatio iuris praecedentiae vel vocis activae et passivae vel iuris ferendi titulos honoris, vestem, insignia, quae Ecclesia concesserit;

12°. Mulcta pecuniaria.

Can. 2292

Poenalis suppressio aut translatio sedis episcopalis est Romano Pontifici reservata; sedis autem paroecialis, a locorum Ordinariis decerni nequit, nisi cum consilio Capituli.

Can. 2293

§1. Infamia est vel iuris vel facti.

§2. Infamia iuris illa est quae casibus iure communi expressis statuitur.

§3. Infamia facti contrahitur, quando quis, ob patratum delictum vel ob pravos mores, bonam existimationem apud fideles probos et graves amisit, de quo iudicium spectat ad Ordinarium.

§4. Neutra afficit delinquentis consanguineos aut affines, firmo praescripto can. 2147, §2, n. 3.

Can. 2294

§1. Qui infamia iuris laborat, non solum est irregularis ad normam can. 984, n. 5, sed insuper est inhabilis ad obtinenda beneficia, pensiones, officia et dignitates ecclesiasticas, ad actus legitimos ecclesiasticos perficiendos, ad exercitium iuris aut muneris

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

ecclesiastici, et tandem arceri debet a ministerio in sacris functionibus exercendo.

§2. Qui laborat infamia facti, repelli debet tum a recipiendis ordinibus ad normam can. 987, n. 7, dignitatibus, beneficiis, officiis ecclesiasticis, tum ab exercendo sacro ministerio et ab actibus legitimis ecclesiasticis.

Can. 2295

Infamia iuris desinit sola dispensatione a Sede Apostolica concessa; infamia facti cum bona existimatio apud fideles probos et graves, omnibus perpensis adiunctis et praesertim diuturna rei emendatione, fuerit, prudenti Ordinarii iudicio, recuperata.

Can. 2296

§1. Si agatur de rebus ad quas assequendas capacitas iure communi statuitur, inhabilitatis poenam infligere una Sedes Apostolica potest.

§2. Iura iam quaesita non amittuntur ob supervenientem inhabilitatem, nisi huic addatur poena privationis.

Can. 2297

Mulctas pecuniarias iure communi inflictas, quarum erogatio non sit eodem iure praefinita, aliasque iure peculiari statutas vel statuendas, Ordinarii locorum erogare debent in pios usus, non vero in commodum mensae episcopalis aut capitularis.

This chapter enumerates,— demonstrative, not taxative, as the word praesertim indicates,— some vindictive penalties which may be imposed on any delinquent Catholic in proportion to the gravity of his crime (see can. 2218).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Four species of penalties are explained in special canons: transfer, infamy, disability, and fines.

1. The interdict, as far as it is imposed upon a community or corporation, is either local or personal, but it is to be considered as a vindictive penalty only if inflicted either forever, or for a certain time, or ad beneplacitum superioris. For if it is imposed merely for the time being, namely, until contumacy ceases, it is a censure. For the rest, the effects do not differ in either case.

2. The interdict ab ingressu ecclesiae forbids, according to can. 2277, entering the church, but only when divine offices are celebrated; during the sermon or at other times the church may be entered.

3. Penal transfer or suppression of an episcopal see or parochial residence differs from the administrative transfer of benefices mentioned in can. 1421 f. Besides stress must be laid on see, or residence, for it means a transfer from one place to another, not extinction. Suppression, however, involves extinction, and in that case a union with another diocese or parish would have to follow; this is called unio extinctiva (can. 1419 f.).

According to can. 2292 penal suppression or transfer of an episcopal see is reserved to the Roman Pontiff, i. e., the S. C. Consistorialis (can. 248). But a parochial residence may be transferred or suppressed by the local Ordinary, provided he has asked the advice (he does not need the consent) of his chapter (with us, the diocesan consultors).

4. There is a twofold infamy distinguished in can. 2293: one of law, the other of fact.

a) Infamy of law (iuris) is that expressly stated in

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google common law as a penalty for certain crimes;[12] it is legal conviction of a crime.

b) Infamy of fact (facti) exists when one, by reason of a crime committed, or on account of bad character, has lost his good reputation with upright and serious Catholics. Whether and when this is the case, is for the Ordinary to decide. Generally speaking, apostates, bigamists, adulterers contract infamia facti. But the facts must be proved, not merely asserted, and, as in criminal cases, at least two trustworthy witnesses are required.[13]

c) The effects of legal infamy are stated as follows:

1°. Legal infamy may be inflicted as a penalty, as per can. 2291, n. 4.

2°. Legal infamy involves irregularity according to can. 984, n. 5, and therefore no layman affected by it can receive the tonsure or any order without an apostolic dispensation.

3°. Legal infamy entails disability or disqualification for any ecclesiastical benefice, pension, office, dignity; if conferred, the act is invalid (can. 2391).

4°. It disqualifies the infamous person from performing any legal ecclesiastical act of the kind mentioned in can. 2256, n. 2, especially sponsorship.[14]

5°. It disqualifies the infamous person from exercising any ecclesiastical right or charge, e. g., the right of election, presentation, or nomination,[15] or such charges as are involved in the offices of notaries, defenders, pro-

12 These crimes are mentioned in canons 2314, § 1, n. 2, 3; 2320; 2328, 2343, § 1, n. 2; § 2, n. 2; 2351, § 2; 2356; 2357, § 1; 2359, § 2.

13 Cfr. I Tim. 5, 19; can. 1939–1946.

14 See canons 765, n. 2; 766, n. 2; 795, n. 2; 796, n. 3.

15 See canons 167, § 1, n. 3; 1470, § 4.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google curators or attorneys, counsel, administrators,[16] and, we suppose, also church trustees.

6°. An infamous person must be prevented from coöperating in sacred functions, such as serving at Mass, carrying the canopy, cross, or censer, playing the organ at divine service, etc.

d) Infamia facti produces the following effects:

1°. It constitutes a canonical impediment for receiving orders, but does not render one irregular (can. 987, n. 7).

2°. It disqualifies one from lawfully (not validly) accepting ecclesiastical dignities, benefices, or offices.

3°. Infamous persons may not exercise any function of the sacred ministry which may ordinarily be performed by laymen, as stated above.

4°. They must be repelled from exercising actus legitimi as explained under can. 2256, n. 2. Those who are manifestly infamous must also be refused the Holy Eucharist (can. 855, §1).

Note that neither legal infamy nor infamy of fact affects the blood relations or legal relations of the infamous subject. Therefore, the consanguinei and affines of an infamous person are not included in this penalty, nor do the effects of infamy affect them. On the other hand, a pastor may incur the infamy of his familiares and blood relations and be removed in an administrative way on this account (can. 2293, §4; can. 2147, §3, n. 3.).[17]

e) Cessation of infamy.

16 See canons 373, § 3; 1571, § 3; 1589, § 1; 1657, § 1; after a condemnatory or declaratory sentence they are excluded from being witnesses or experts; can. 1757, 1795, 1931; but not from being plaintiffs, at least no such exclusion is stated; Eichmann, l. c., p. III.

17 Can. 1755, § 2, n. 2, must be applied to both kinds of infamy, and hence a witness who is afraid of causing infamy to himself or to his relatives is not obliged to answer on the witness stand.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1°. Legal infamy or infamia iuris can be removed only by an Apostolic dispensation; this is true with one exception, viz.: occult urgent cases, for in these can. 2290 may be applied.[18]

2°. Infamy of fact (infamia facti) ceases by rehabilitation of one's good name, i. e., by regaining one's lost reputation with upright and serious Catholics. This depends upon particular circumstances, continued good behavior, and, above all, on the judgment of the Ordinary.

An observation on civil infamy may not be superfluous. The Roman law[19] branded several crimes with infamy (infamia notati). Its regulations were partly adopted and partly modified by the common law.[20] However, the modern civil legislation on this subject, though based upon the Roman law, at least in Latin countries, has never been formally adopted by the Church. Consequently, when we speak of infamia iuris in ecclesiastical language, this must be strictly understood of Canon Law only. It does not follow, however, that civil infamy, which generally consists in the withdrawal of civic rights, at least for a time, does not produce canonical infamy of fact (infamia facti).[21] Therefore bishops, as custodians of discipline, should not lose sight of the particular laws of their respective countries. In England and many States of the U. S., all disqualifications, such as disability to serve as witness or juror, have been abolished.[22] Notwithstanding this abolition of the effects of infamy, however, certain crimes are still known as infamous and should therefore be taken as a directive norm for 18 See also can. 1948, § 1: correptio iudicialis cannot be substituted in case of infamy.

19 Cfr. Dig. 3, 2, de his qui infamia notantur.

20 Cfr. cc. 2, 17, C. 6, q. 1; c. 5, Dist. 51; c. 4, x, IV, 21; c. 5, 6°, V, 9.

21 Wernz, l. c., VI, p. 112, n. 105.

22 New International Encycl., 1904, Vol. X, s. v. "Infamy."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google ecclesiastical presumption, more especially when admission to the clerical state is in question.

5. Privation of ecclesiastical burial, according to the rules laid down in can. 1240, §1.

6. Privation of the sacramentals, for instance, churching of women, nuptial blessing, blessing of homes.

7. Privation or temporary suspension of pensions which the Church is wont to pay, or which come from ecclesiastical property; also withdrawal of some other ecclesiastical rights or privileges. Therefore, state pensions or pensions paid by private persons or companies, although they may have an ecclesiastical name or be under ecclesiastical guidance, do not fall under the heading of ecclesiastical pensions.[23] A right that may be withheld is that of presentation, a privilege, that of a private oratory or a special seat in church.

8. Exclusion from legal ecclesiastical functions, such as sponsorship, proxy, lawyer (see can. 2256, n. 2).

9. Disability to obtain: (a) ecclesiastical favors, for instance, dispensations or privileges; (b) charges which do not presuppose the clerical state, for instance, notary, administrator, beadle, sexton, etc.; (c) academic degrees which are conferred by church authorities, either by ecclesiastical institutes[24] in the ordinary way, or by favor, i. e., honoris causa.

Can. 2296, on disability, has two sections. The first supposes that disability may be established by common law (iure communi) or by a particular law, as also ab

23 Eichmann, l. c., p. 112.

24 Degrees conferred by secular universities are not excluded; nor are academic degrees which are conferred by ecclesiastical institutions, but in virtue of civil or State authority, for the text says: auctoritate ecclesiastica. Hence if a college or university has obtained a State diploma enabling it to grant B.A. or M.A. or Ph.D., etc., it may be legitimately acquired and retained.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

homine. Disability by common law, as, for instance, with regard to orders and advowson,[25] can be inflicted only by the Apostolic See. But if a particular law or diocesan statute should attach special qualities to a certain charge held in the diocese (for instance, church trustee), the disqualification can be established by the local Ordinary.[26]

§2 of can. 2296 states that rights already acquired, e. g., the right of a private oratory, are not taken away by a supervening disability. Disqualification, therefore, concerns only the future, not the past. However, the text adds quite logically: "Nisi huic addatur poena privationis"; for if the penalty of privation is added and doubled, it is evident that charges, rights, favors, academic degrees may also be taken away; for it lies in the nature of privation that a man cannot be deprived of what he does not possess.

10. Privation or temporary suspension of a charge, faculty, or privilege already obtained. Concerning cases in which the Ordinary may dispense, see can. 2237. If privation requires a declaratory sentence, infamy excuses from its observance (can. 2232, §1), unless the crime is notorious. If the sentence of privation has been validly issued and carried out, the office becomes vacant (can. 183, §1).

11. Withdrawal of the right of precedence, of the active and passive voice, of the right of using honorary titles, of wearing robes and insignia granted by the Church, for instance, pontifical emblems and prelatical garb.[27]

12. Pecuniary fines began to be imposed in the seventh century and became quite frequent after the Germanic

25 Can. 948 ff., 1453, 2383, 2394.
26 See can. 2237 concerning public and occult cases.
27 See canons 325; 349, § 1, n. 2; 405; 407; 409.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

laws were applied.[28] But abuses soon crept in and became so scandalous that the Council of Trent thought it necessary to limit such fines.[29] The Code admits them for canons, for ecclesiastical judges, lawyers, and procurators, against unlawful alienators, unjust copyists or officials of diocesan courts who have to do with official documents, and those who overcharge in demanding taxes.[30]

The Code (can. 2297) regulates the use of fines as follows: Pecuniary fines inflicted by common law, but not determined by the same as to the manner in which they are to be employed, also fines established or to be inflicted by particular law, must be spent by the Ordinaries for charitable purposes, never for enriching the episcopal or capitular fund. Although payment could be enforced by ecclesiastical censures (can. 2198), the secular arm would hardly lend its aid in the matter.

28 Kober, in the Tübinger Quartalschrift, 1881, p. 3 ff. On pecuniary fines see c. 41, X, V, 3; c. 14, X; V, 6; c. 2, X, V, 26; c. 7, X, V, 36; Hollweck, l. c., p. 154, § 85.

29 Trid., Sess. 25, c. 3, de ref.

30 See canons 395, § 2; 413; 1625, § 2; 1666; 2347, n. 2; 2406, § 2; 2408.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER II

VINDICTIVE PENALTIES FOR CLERICS

Can. 2298

Poenae vindicativae quae clericis tantum applicantur, sunt:

1°. Prohibitio exercendi sacrum ministerium praeterquam in certa ecclesia;

2°. Suspensio in perpetuum vel ad tempus praefinitum, vel ad beneplacitum Superioris;

3°. Translatio poenalis ab officio vel beneficio obtento ad inferius;

4°. Privatio alicuius iuris cum beneficio vel officio coniuncti;

5°. Inhabilitas ad omnes vel ad aliquot dignitates, officia, beneficia aliave munera propria clericorum;

6°. Privatio poenalis beneficii vel officii cum vel sine pensione;

7°. Prohibitio commorandi in certo loco vel territorio;

8°. Praescriptio commorandi in certo loco vel territorio;

9°. Privatio ad tempus habitus ecclesiastici;

10°. Depositio;

11°. Privatio perpetua habitus ecclesiastici;

12°. Degradatio.

Can. 2299

§1. Si clericus beneficium inamovibile obtineat,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

eodem in poenam privari potest solum in casibus iure expressis; si amovibile, etiam ob alias rationabiles causas.

§2. Clerici obtinentes beneficia, officia, dignitates, possunt etiam aliquo tantum ministerio cum iisdem coniuncto, ex. gr., ministerio praedicandi, confessiones audiendi, etc., prohiberi ad certum tempus.

§3. Nequit clericus privari beneficio aut pensione cuius titulo ordinatus fuit, nisi aliunde eius honestae sustentationi provideatur, salvo praescripto can. 2303, 2304.

Can. 2300

Si clericus gravia scandala praebeat et monitus non resipiscat, nec scandalum queat aliter removeri, potest interim privari iure deferendi habitum ecclesiasticum; quae privatio, dum perdurat, secumfert prohibitionem exercendi ministeria quaevis ecclesiastica et privationem privilegiorum clericalium.

Can. 2301

Ordinarius nequit praescribere ut clericus certo in loco, extra fines suae dioecesis, commoretur, nisi accedat consensus Ordinarii illius loci vel agatur de domo poenitentiae seu emendationis clericis non solum dioecesanis, sed etiam extraneis destinata, aut de domo religiosa exempta, Superiore eiusdem consentiente.

Can. 2302

Tam praescriptio quam prohibitio certo in loco commorandi et collocatio in domo poenitentiae aut in domo

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google religiosa, praesertim si diu duraturae sint, imponantur tantum in casibus gravibus, in quibus, prudenti Ordinarii iudicio, eae poenae necessariae sint ad clerici emendationem aut scandali reparationem.

Can. 2303

§1. Depositio, firmis obligationibus e suscepto ordine exortis et privilegiis clericalibus, secumfert tum suspensionem ab officio, et inhabilitatem ad quaelibet officia, dignitates, beneficia, pensiones, munera in Ecclesia, tum etiam privationem illorum quae reus habeat, licet eorum titulo fuerit ordinatus.

§2. Sed hoc ultimo in casu, si clericus vere indigeat, Ordinarius pro sua caritate, quo meliore modo fieri potest, ei providere curet, ne cum dedecore status clericalis mendicare cogatur.

§3. Poena depositionis infligi nequit, nisi in casibus iure expressis.

Can. 2304

§1. Si clericus depositus non det emendationis signa et praesertim si scandalum dare pergat monitusque non resipiscat, Ordinarius potest eum perpetuo privare iure deferendi habitum ecclesiasticum.

§2. Haec privatio secumfert privationem privilegiorum clericalium et cessationem praescripti can. 2303, §2.

Can. 2305

§1. Degradatio in se continet depositionem, perpetuam privationem habitus ecclesiastici et reductionem clerici ad statum laicalem.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§2. Haec poena ferri solummodo potest propter delictum in iure expressum, aut si clericus, iam depositus et habitu clericali privatus, grave adhuc scandalum per annum praebere pergat.

§3. Alia est verbalis seu edictalis, quae sola sententia irrogatur, ita tamen ut omnes suos effectus iuridicos statim habeat sine ulla exsecutione; alia realis, si serventur sollemnia praescripta in Pontificali Romano.

Some penalties formerly employed, even against clerics, such as branding, bodily chastisement (fustigatio), exile, imprisonment and permanent confinement in monasteries, are not mentioned in the Code.[1]

This enumeration of twelve species of penalties seems not to be complete, but applies to clerics only (clericis tantum).

1°. Prohibition of exercising the sacred ministry except in a specified church. Thus a clergyman may be told to say Mass in a certain chapel or church only, or preach only in a certain church of a city, whilst all others are forbidden to him.

2°. Perpetual suspension, or suspension for a specified term or ad beneplacitum superioris, in which latter case the superior may shorten or lengthen the time.

3°. Transfer from a better office or benefice to an inferior one, which is always odious and, therefore, savors

1 Perforation of the tongue and the galleys (after degradation, especially of the so-called diaconi selvaggi) were also sometimes used. Such are not exactly in accordance with our present, rather sentimental, notions of the penal code, and are, therefore, discarded. On the other hand, it must not be forgotten that bishops and popes, and also abbots, as temporal lords of their respective territories, when employing such penalties, acted like other monarchs according to the custom of their times; Hollweck, l. c.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of degradation and, of course, involves loss of jurisdiction in the territory from which the transfer is made.[2]

4°. Privation of one or the other right connected with a benefice, e. g., administration of the same, or with an office, e. g., the exercise of preaching or hearing confessions, or, for bishops, the granting of faculties or free appointment to offices.

5°. Disability for all or certain dignities, offices, benefices, and clerical charges, which also extends to religious offices.[3] Here can. 2296, §2 must be applied, although one may find there an analogy which is inadmissible in penal matters. The analogy, however, consists not in the application of the penalty, but only in the competency to inflict it. Consequently the Ordinary cannot decree disability for holding offices already possessed or acquired,[4] but only disqualify the delinquent for the future, i. e., debar him from obtaining other dignities, offices, benefices, charges which may be held by clergymen. Besides, also in case of clergymen, can. 2296, §1, must be applied, so that only the Apostolic See can inflict this penalty if it is stated in common law. Only the Apostolic See can dispense in public cases of inhabilitas latae sententiae.[5]

6°. Privation of benefice or office, with or without pension, which is followed by a vacancy in the office or benefice itself, provided it be decreed ipso iure or after a regular trial.[6] This is called penal privation, because there is another, viz., the administrative one, treated in can. 2147 ff. Here can. 2299 must be added, which

2 See canons 2162-2167: 183; 873, § 3.

3 See can. 2413.

4 Here it may be added that the ius ad rem, for instance, by accepting an election, is a real right and consequently included.

5 Can. 2237, § 1, n. 3; Thesaurus-Giraldi, l. c., P. I, c. 28 (ed cit., p. 49)

6 See can. 183, § 1; can. 192.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

further determines the penalty in question as follows:

a) An irremovable beneficiary — our irremovable rectors are here included — can be deprived of his benefice (or pastorship) only in cases expressly stated in law;[7] a removable beneficiary, on the other hand, may be deprived of his benefice also for other reasonable causes, such as protracted disobedience or neglect of pastoral duties, and those mentioned in can. 2182.

b) Clergymen who are in possession of benefices, offices, or dignities may be forbidden to exercise part of their ministerial functions for a special term; for instance, they may have to abstain from preaching or hearing confessions, or from administering their benefice, or from exercising the functions of their dignity. Of course, this must be clearly expressed, for instance, by withdrawing the faculty of hearing confessions, etc. That with the total withdrawal of all faculties the office also is withdrawn, is evident.

c) A cleric cannot be deprived of the benefice or pension which constitute his titulus ordinationis,[8] except in the cases mentioned in can. 2303 and 2304. If the Ordinary should deprive a cleric of the benefice or pension to which he has been ordained, the Ordinary must provide a decent support, for instance, by offering the cleric another position or pension, or maintaining him in a charitable house. In cases of deposition this latter obligation on the part of the Ordinary ceases to be one of 7 Latae sententiae; see canons 2396, 2397, 2398, 2366.

Ferendae sententiae; canons 2314, § 1, n. 2; 2331, § 2; 2340, § 2; 2343, § 2; n. 3, 2354, § 2; 2359, § 2; 2368, § 1; 2345; 2346; 2350, § 2; 2381, n. 2.
Facultative; canons 2324, 2336, § 1, 2; 2355; 2359, § 2; 2360, § 2; 2394 n. 2, 2403; 2405.

8 See can. 979.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

justice and becomes one merely of charity (can. 2303, §2). In cases of degradation both titles, of justice as well as charity, cease to oblige the Ordinary (can. 2404).

7°. Prohibition to live in a certain place or territory.

8°. Command to stay in a certain place or territory. Concerning these two penalties canons 2301 and 2302 must be consulted.

a) The Ordinary cannot order such a cleric to live in a certain place outside his own diocese. For his jurisdiction is territorially circumscribed, and only if the Ordinary of the other diocese gives his formal consent, may the clergyman thus ordered to live in a strange diocese remain there. If there should be an interdiocesan house of correction or detention, the Ordinary may send a cleric there, because it is supposed that all the bishops concerned have an agreement among themselves to that effect. If the Ordinary wishes to inflict on a cleric the punishment pronounced in n. 8, with the command to stay, for the time being, in a religious house that belongs to an exempt institute, he can do so only with the consent of the respective superior. For with regard to this matter the local Ordinary has no power over exempt houses in his diocese, though with non-exempt houses he can deal more imperiously, although it would not be against the dictates of natural equity if he would first consult the religious superior, for religious houses are not reform schools or houses of correction.

b) The command to stay in a certain place or in a house of correction or a religious house, especially for a considerable time, should not be imposed except for weighty reasons, such as the necessary amendment of the clergyman or the repairing of scandal. The Ordinary is the judge, but he should give the cleric a fair hearing and not simply "shut him off," as one Archbishop did in a case brought before the S. Congregation.[9] 9°. On prohibition to wear the ecclesiastical dress enough has been said under can. 136. It refers, of course, to the usual clerical garb and tonsure (can. 213, §1), not the vestments used in the sacred ministry.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Concerning this penalty, can. 2300 makes the following regulations:

a) Temporary privation of this right can only be inflicted if the scandal given by the cleric is really serious, after admonition has proved useless,[10] and the scandal [11] cannot be removed in any other way.

b) As long as the privation lasts, its effects are:

α) The clergyman thus punished is not allowed to perform any act of his ecclesiastical ministry. The text does not declare the invalidity of such acts, e. g., of jurisdiction exercised in the confessional, or assistance at marriage, nor the loss of the respective office; therefore, the least is to be taken.

β) This privation entails the loss of the clerical privileges or rights mentioned in can. 118-123.

10°. Deposition,[12] one of the oldest and at the same time, heaviest ecclesiastical penalties, consists in the pri-

9 S. C. EE. et RR., March 6, 1841 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 532) instructed the archbishop to leave the priest in peace or give him a fair hearing. A kind of long exile or prohibition to stay in one's diocese might cause a conflict with the civil authorities; for ordinaries have no right to forbid one to stay in a certain place from the viewpoint of civil law.

10 On admonition, see can. 2143.

11 Notice the plural scandala, which may mean diverse or protracted or repeated scandals.

12 See Kober, Die Deposition und Degradation, 1867: formerly deposition and degradation were identical, and entailed loss of office and benefice together with disqualification, but the privileges fori and canonis remained. After the XIIth century, however, deposition was clearly distinguished from degradation, which later only implied loss of the clerical privileges, see c. 10, X, II, 1; c. 7, X, V, 20; c. 27, X, V, 40.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

vation of all the titles that a clergyman may possess, except the clerical state itself and its essential privileges. Its effects are more minutely described in can. 2303 as follows:

a) The obligations inherent in the order received, as well as the clerical privileges remain. Therefore, even a deposed cleric, if he has been ordained subdeacon, must recite the Breviary and remain unmarried (can. 132, 135), and retains the prerogatives mentioned in can. 118-123.

b) A deposed cleric is ipso facto suspended from office;

c) He is disqualified for any office, dignity, benefice, pension or any ecclesiastical charge (munus);

d) He is deprived of all the offices, dignities, benefices, pensions, and charges that he holds, even though he has been ordained on the title of benefice or pension. However, in case of the benefice or pension being the title on which the clergyman was ordained, the Ordinary should act charitably towards a needy cleric and provide him with the necessary support, so that he may not be compelled to beg his living and so disgrace the clerical state.

No juridical claim can be asserted against this charitable support. Even if the clergyman belongs to a clerical aid society, which is based on mutual agreement and contributions, he can in justice claim diocesan support, because he still belongs to the clergy and is supposed to be still incardinated. For our text, can. 2303, §2, only mentions the two canonical sources of support: benefice and pension. These, however, are essentially distinct from a clerical aid society. On the other hand, it must also be noted that the Ordinary, in case such a society should furnish the means for an indigent clergyman, would not be obliged to exercise charity towards him. Besides, the by-laws or constitutions might contain other regulations precluding a deposed clergyman from the benefit of support.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The mode of inflicting the penalty of deposition is indicated in can. 2303, §3: "It cannot be inflicted except for crimes expressly stated in the Code." However, the Code knows no penalty which would be incurred ipso iure or latae sententiae.[13] But cases ferendae sententiae are mentioned.[14] If the Ordinary wishes to depose a clergyman, he has to proceed in the judiciary way, and constitute a collegiate body of five judges,—otherwise the trial is null and void.[14a] In cases where deposition is inflicted, can. 1948, §1 and can. 2288 must be applied.

11°. Perpetual privation of the clerical garb is a more serious penalty than even deposition. For, as can. 2304, §2 states, it implies privation of all clerical privileges and releases the Ordinary from even the charitable obligation of providing the necessary support for an indigent cleric. But, as the same can. 2304, §1 says, this penalty can only be inflicted,

a) If the cleric has been previously deposed;

b) If he shows no signs of repentance, but rather continues to give scandal;

c) If he does not heed the admonitions addressed to 13 The Decretals are ambiguous, so that some, for instance, Thesaurus-Giraldi (P. I, c. 27), could speak of a deposition latae sententiae; see c. 3, X, V, 27; c. 1, § 2, 6°, V, 4; c. 5, 6°, V, 9; c. un. Extrav. Comm., V, 6. Hollweck, l. c., p. 158, § 91, note 1, denies that such a penalty latae sent. can be read into the old law.

14 See can. 2314, § 1, n. 2; 2320; 2322, n. 1; 2328; 2350, § 1; 2354, § 2; 2359, § 2; 2379; 2394, n. 2; 2401; a canonically deposed cardinal loses the active voice: "Vacante Sede," n. 31.

14a Can. 1576, §1, n. 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

him.[15] All these conditions must concur in order to permit the Ordinary to inflict this penalty. The trial must be conducted in the same way as for deposition.[16] This also applies to religious superiors who have to proceed in such cases.[17]

12°. Degradation, the last and severest of all clerical penalties, consists in the reduction of a cleric to the lay state. This seems to be impossible on account of the indelible character imprinted by the Sacrament of Holy Orders, but since a real distinction was introduced between deposition and degradation in the XII century, it was but logical to maintain the severest penalty for those who had juridically degraded themselves.

a) The effects of degradation, according to can. 2305, §1, are: deposition, perpetual privation of the clerical dress, and reduction to the lay state. These effects follow both kinds of degradation, the verbal as well as the real (verbalis seu edictalis et realis), as the difference between the two lies only in the mode of application. Verbal degradation requires merely a judicial sentence, whereas real must be accompanied by the ceremonies described in the Roman Pontifical.[18] Note that even a degraded cleric is bound to observe celibacy.[19]

b) This penalty is ferendae sententiae only, since no case of latae sententiae is mentioned in the Code. Therefore the text (can. 2305, §2) says: "ferri potest,"

15 Can. 2143.

16 Can. 1576, § 1, n. 2.

17 Can. 670.

18 P. III: "Degradationis Forma," which contains the doleful ceremonies of degradation, commencing with the rite for degrading a Pope and ending with that for tonsured clerics. This ceremony, as stated in the Pont. Rom., presupposes that the clergyman was tried and sentence was given, and, besides, that he is offered to the local ordinary for this act of humiliation.

19 Cfr. can. 213, § 2; but the obligation of reciting the Breviary ceases; can. 138.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

it may be inflicted for crimes mentioned in the law;[20] or if the cleric, being already deposed and deprived of the clerical garb, continues for one year to give scandal. Attention must again be drawn to can. 1576, §1, n. 2, which requires five judges to pronounce sentence, and to can. 1948, §1, which forbids substituting the judicial warning in this case, and to can. 2288, which excludes a suspension of the execution of the sentence.

20 These cases, besides the one mentioned in the second clause of can. 2305, § 2, are canons 2314, § 1, n. 3; 2343, § 1, n. 3; 2354, § 2; 2368; 2388, § 1.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE X

PENAL REMEDIES AND PENANCES

The title is divided into two chapters, the first of which treats of penal or preventive remedies, the other of penances. This order is logical, since penal remedies are more closely related to penalties proper than the so-called penances. For penal remedies cause some deprivation or pain to normally constituted persons, and this is essential to any penalty. All such remedies leave a stain upon the moral character of the person subjected to them. They presuppose a punishable crime or at least blameworthy conduct, which might lead to more serious breaches of the penal laws. Therefore penal remedies, as stated, partake of the nature of penalties. This applies also to the mode by which they are inflicted. Some of them are mentioned in the decrees of the Council of Trent,[1] others were introduced by later disciplinary laws and now appear formally sanctioned in the Code.[2] To each of the penal remedies we shall add the respective canons referring to them.

1 Trid., Sess. 13, c. 1, de ref.

2 S. C. EE. et RR., June 11, 1880 (Coll. P. F., n. 1534); see also Wernz, l. c., VI, p. 257, n. 253 f.; Eichmann, l. c., p. 121.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

CHAPTER I

PENAL REMEDIES

Can. 2306

Remedia poenalia sunt:
1°. Monitio;
2°. Correptio;
3°. Praeceptum;
4°. Vigilantia.

Can. 2307

Eum qui versatur in proxima occasione delictum committendi vel in quem, ex inquisitione peracta, gravis suspicio cadit delicti commissi, Ordinarius per se vel per interpositam personam moneat.

Can. 2308

Si ex alicuius conversatione scandalum vel gravis ordinis perturbatio oriantur, est locus correptioni, ab Ordinario per se vel per interpositam personam, etiam per epistolam faciendae, peculiaribus accommodatae conditionibus personae et facti de quo agitur.

Can. 2309

§1. Tam monitio quam correptio potest esse vel publica vel secreta.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

§2. Correptio vel monitio publica fiat vel coram notario aut duobus testibus, vel per epistolam ita tamen ut de receptione et tenore epistolae ex aliquo documento constet.

§3. Correptio publica fieri tantum potest adversus reum de delicto convictum vel confessum; et est iudicialis, si fiat a iudice pro tribunali sedente vel ab Ordinario ante processum criminalem.

§4. Correptio iudicialis vel habetur loco poenae vel fit ad augendam poenam, praecipue si agatur de recidivo.

§5. De monitione et correptione, etsi secreto factae fuerint, constare debet ex aliquo documento in secreto archivo Curiae asservando.

§6. Tam correptio quam monitio fieri potest semel vel pluries, pro Superioris arbitrio et prudentia.

Can. 2310

Monitionibus et correptionibus incassum factis, vel si ex eisdem effectum sperare non liceat, datur praeceptum, quo quid agere quidve evitare praeventus debeat, accurate indicetur, cum poenae comminatione in casu transgressionis.

Can. 2311

§1. Si casus gravitas ferat et praecipue si agatur de eo qui in periculo versatur relabendi in idem crimen, eum Ordinarius submittat vigilantiae.

§2. Vigilantia praecipi quoque potest ad augendam poenam, praecipue in recidivos.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Penal remedies are intended as means of preventing a more serious breach of the public order and discipline of the Church and thus of rendering the application of penalties in the strict sense either remote or superfluous. The Code distinguishes four kinds of preventive remedies: warning, correction, order or precept, and surveillance.

1 Warning may be given either by the Ordinary himself or by another person at his request, in case one is in the proximate occasion of committing a crime, or in case of a person who has fallen under serious suspicion of having committed a crime, investigation already made justifying such a suspicion. The occasion is proximate if dangerous company, especially in the same house, proves a stumbling block to the person's virtue.[3] The investigation must be made according to can. 1936-1946. How to proceed is laid down in can. 2309, and is the same as for

2. The rebuke or correctio, which is administered to a person whose conduct causes scandal or a serious disturbance of the public order (e. g., bigamy and concubinage). The warning may be given by the Ordinary personally or through another trustworthy person, orally or by letter. But it should be so worded as to suit the conditions of the respective person and case; which means that the social and individual character and position of the person in question should be considered as well as the nature of the case. For there are cases that necessitate great delicacy and prudence.

The manner in which both warning and rebuke must be administered is set forth in can. 2309, as follows:

[3] As in mixed marriages, frequenting of suspected theatres and families, etc.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

a) The warning or rebuke may be either public or secret. If secret, it is rather paternal and generally given in writing or through an intermediary,[4] who, however, must be commissioned by the Ordinary, i. e., by the diocesan bishop, or the prelate nullius, or the exempt religious superior, but not the vicar-general, unless he has received a special commission for this purpose. The reason is that penal remedies partake of the nature of penalties, concerning which, according to can. 2220, §2, the vicar-general is not competent in virtue of his office. He may, however, like the dean or pastor, be employed as persona interposita.

b) Public correction or admonition must be made either before a notary, who in this case may also be the chancellor,[5] or in the presence of two witnesses, who may be discreet laymen, or by letter, which should be registered. If by letter, a record must be kept, showing that it was delivered,[6] and an abstract of the contents must be preserved in the diocesan chancery or court.

c) A public rebuke — not a warning — can be served only when the delinquent has been convicted of, or confessed, a crime. It is a judiciary rebuke (correptio iudicialis) [7] if administered by the judge sitting in tribunal or by the Ordinary (not the vicar-general unless he has a special mandate) before the criminal procedure has taken a legal turn.

d) A judiciary rebuke may take the place of a criminal penalty or may be added to the criminal penalty, especially in case of relapse.

e) Both admonition and correction, if made secretly, must be recorded in writing and an abstract of the records

4 S. C. EE. et RR., June 11, 1880, n. 6.

5 Can. 372, § 3.

6 The receipt for the registered letter should be inserted in actis.

7 See can. 1947–1953.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

kept in the secret archives of the diocesan court, because they may be needed as documents for criminal procedure.

f) Both warning and rebuke may be administered once or oftener, as the superior shall judge prudent. Although the word peremptory should be employed for the sake of greater efficacy, yet the rebuke or warning could not be impugned if this term were omitted, because the Code contains nothing to that effect, but insists only on registration.

3. A precept, order, or injunction is a special command of the bishop, accompanied by threats of punishment in case of disobedience.[8] It may be served after a warning or a rebuke has proved ineffective or if it is likely that these two, warning and rebuke, will not produce the desired effect. Therefore, in this latter case, the warning and rebuke may be omitted, and the bishop — not the vicar-general — may proceed at once to issue an injunction. This, no doubt, depends on the psychological condition of the delinquent (obstinacy, hot temper) and on the nature of the delinquency, whether the scandal or neglect is great and wide-spread or not. The precept must contain as clear and distinct a statement as the case permits, of what the praeventus[9] must do or avoid.

4. Surveillance or vigilance, as a separate and distinct penal remedy, is entirely new,[10] though the well known Motu proprio of Pius X, "Sacrorum antistitum," Sept. 1, 1910, appointed a vigilance committee against modernistic tendencies. Here it has the character of a special penalty, and according to the order of enumeration, is the severest

8 S. C. EE. et RR., l. c., n. 1, 1880, n. 7, which furnished the substance of our text.

9 Praeventus in the text implies that one has been served with an anticipated or informal accusation.

10 S. C. EE. et RR., l. c., n. 1 says: "Ordinario iudici pastorale onus incumbit . . . super eorundem vitae rationem vigilando"; but this is a general obligation, not a penal remedy.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of the penal remedies. It is doubtless the most disagreeable one, especially in our country, although even the civil law employs police vigilance.

Can. 1311 says that a very serious case may demand vigilance, especially if a person is exposed to the danger of relapse into the same crime. Under such conditions the Ordinary may place the person in question, whether he be a layman or a cleric, under special supervision. But he may also increase the penalty, particularly for recidivi.

It may be added that, since injunction and surveillance are severer penal remedies than warning and rebuke, the procedure required for the latter a fortiori also applies to the former.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

CHAPTER II

PENANCES

Can. 2312

§1. Poenitentiae in foro externo imponuntur ut delinquens vel poenam effugiat, vel poenae contractae absolutionem aut dispensationem recipiat.

§2. Ob delictum aut transgressionem occultam nunquam poenitentia publica imponatur.

§3. Poenitentiae non tam secundum quantitatem delicti, quam secundum poenitentis contritionem moderandae sunt, pensatis qualitatibus personarum et delictorum adiunctis.

Can. 2313

§1. Praecipuae poenitentiae sunt praecepta:

1°. Recitandi determinatas preces;

2°. Peragendi piam aliquam peregrinationem vel alia pietatis opera;

3°. Servandi peculiare ieiunium;

4°. Erogandi eleemosynas in pios usus;

5°. Peragendi exercitia spiritualia in pia aut religiosa domo per aliquot dies.

§2. Poenitentias Ordinarius pro sua prudentia addere potest poenali remedio monitionis et correptionis.

Penance, in the external forum, means penal satisfaction and may be compared, to some extent, to an apology.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The Code first determines the effect or object of penances and then enumerates some special kinds.

1. Penances are imposed, in the external forum, in order that the delinquent may escape a canonical penalty, properly so-called, or that he may obtain absolution or dispensation from a penalty already imposed.

Hence a penance may be decreed,[11] even if no censure latae sententiae has been incurred on account of ignorance. Besides the willing assumption of a penance is indicative of willingness to recede from contumacy[12] and renders one worthy of a dispensation, even though the latter depends entirely on the superior's good pleasure. In former times public penances were applied quite frequently; but they could be redeemed,[13] and this led to many abuses, so that, about the thirteenth, and especially in the fourteenth century, public penances fell entirely into desuetude. However, although public sacramental penances are abolished, yet some public penances may even now be imposed. But the Code clearly states (can. 2312, §2) that no public penance can ever be imposed for an occult crime or transgression, even though the penitent should be willing to undergo it. This text is negatively worded and therefore admits of a conversion of terms, scil.: A public penance may be imposed for a public crime.[14]

The kind of penance imposed should be proportionate, not so much to the gravity of the crime, as to the disposition of the delinquent. And in meting it out, due regard should be paid to the qualities of the person concerned and the nature of his crime.[15]

11 Can. 2229, § 3, n. 1.
12 Can. 2224, § 3.
13 See X, V, 38 of the Decretals and the commentators thereon.
14 For instance, apologizing to a congregation for marrying before a non-Catholic minister.
15 See cc. 7, 8, X, V, 38.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2. The principal penances, though not the only ones, are:

a) To recite certain prayers, e. g., the penitential psalms, or the Stations of the cross, or the Rosary;

b) To make a pilgrimage to a certain shrine—provided the penitent has the means to do so and is physically able,— or to perform other devotional works, such as taking care of the church or altar;

c) To observe special fasts, if one's work or family permits;

d) To give alms for charitable purposes;

e) To retire for some days into a religious house.

These penances may be imposed by the Ordinary (but not by the vicar-general) and they may be inflicted either judicially or extra-judicially.[16]

[16] See can. 1933, § 4.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

PART III

PENALTIES FOR INDIVIDUAL CRIMES

The Code now proceeds to the consideration of the penalties to be inflicted for specified crimes. The nature of the latter furnishes a basis for classifying the former. It is not the kind of penalty, as was the case in the Constitution "Apostolicae Sedis," of 1869, but the character of the transgression that constitutes the formal basis of division. The Code contains all the penalties now applied, whilst the aforesaid Constitution only dealt with censures: excommunication, suspension, and interdict. This exhaustive treatment of ecclesiastical penalties[1] renders a return to former sources as such (though not, of course, as historical and interpretative aids) quite superfluous. Therefore we shall refer to former laws in the footnotes rather than in the text, except in as far as they contribute to a clearer understanding of the present discipline. Note that some terms and subjects, which seem to require an explanation, have been treated in former volumes of this Commentary.

1 See can. 6, n. 5; can. 2219; can. 2226, § 2, 3.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XI

CRIMES AGAINST FAITH AND UNITY

It is quite natural that a society which claims to be the one Church instituted by Christ, should direct its first penalty against crimes that subvert its very foundation, i. e., divine and Catholic faith. Belief in the divine mission and the dogmas of the Church is attacked and shattered by apostasy, heresy, and schism, to which must be added every suspicion uttered publicly and the denial of propositions which, though not formally dogmas, are closely connected with the deposit of faith. Special danger to the faith arises from the perusal of writings that attack the Church and her teachings. Finally, the practice of faith is relaxed, and faith itself jeopardized, by too free intercourse with non-Catholics, either in sacred things or socially.

APOSTASY, HERESY, AND SCHISM

Can. 2314

§1. Omnes a christiana fide apostatae et omnes et singuli haeretici aut schismatici:

1°. Incurrunt ipso facto excommunicationem;

2°. Nisi moniti resipuerint, priventur beneficio, dignitate, pensione, officio aliove munere, si quod in Ecclesia habeant, infames declarentur, et clerici, iterata monitione, deponantur;

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3°. Si sectae acatholicae nomen dederint vel publice adhaeserint, ipso facto infames sunt et, firmo praescripto can. 188, n. 4, clerici, monitione incassum praemissa, degradentur.

§2. Absolutio ab excommunicatione de qua in §1, in foro conscientiae impertienda, est speciali modo Sedi Apostolicae reservata. Si tamen delictum apostasiae, haeresis vel schismatis ad forum externum Ordinarii loci quovis modo deductum fuerit, etiam per voluntariam confessionem, idem Ordinarius, non vero Vicarius Generalis sine mandato speciali, resipiscentem, praevia abiuratione iuridice peracta aliisque servatis de iure servandis, sua auctoritate ordinaria in foro exteriore absolvere potest; ita vero absolutus, potest deinde a peccato absolvi a quolibet confessario in foro conscientiae. Abiuratio vero habetur iuridice peracta cum fit coram ipso Ordinario loci vel eius delegato et saltem duobus testibus.

§1. All apostates from the Christian faith and all heretics and schismatics:

1°. Incur excommunication ipso facto, and

2°. Unless they repent, shall be deprived of any benefice, dignity, pension or other charge which they may hold in the Church, and be declared infamous; clerics, after repeated warning, shall be deposed;

3°. If apostates, heretics or schismatics have joined a non-Catholic sect, or publicly professed themselves members thereof, they are by this very fact (ipso facto) infamous; clerics, after having been warned without result, must be degraded and their offices thereby become vacant.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1) What the terms apostates, heretics, schismatics mean, has been explained in can. 1325, §2. All three presuppose valid baptism. By apostates are here understood all who have gone astray from the Christian faith (devii a fide).[2] For the rest it matters not whether the apostate has espoused Paganism, Judaism, Mohammedanism, or atheism, or whether he is a mere unbeliever. Therefore also Freethinkers must be included in the term, because they reject all authority in matters of faith.[3] Concerning Spiritists there is room for doubt. For although it is quite evident that Spiritism as a sect is heretical,[4] or rather tantamount to apostasy, because it retains hardly anything specifically Christian, yet it is possible, nay probable, that some of its followers may persuade themselves that they are Catholics, and can not, therefore, be classified among those mentioned in can. 2205, §3. The benefit of doubt may be applied to them (can. 209).

Heretics, according to can. 1325, §2, are such as deny obstinately one or more articles of faith. It is not necessary to join a non-Catholic sect in order to be a heretic in the sense of §1, n. 1.

Schismatics refuse obedience to the Roman Pontiff and therefore are outside the communion of the faithful.

2 Apost. Sedis, I, 1: "Omnes a christiana fide apostatas, et omnes ac singulos haereticos, quocumque nomine censeantur, et cuiuscumque sectae existant, eisque credentes, eorumque receptores, fautores ac generaliter quoslibet illorum defensores."—I, 3: "Schismaticos, et eos, qui a Romani Pontificis pro tempore existentis obedientia pertinaciter se subtrahunt, vel recedunt." S. Thom., II–II, q. 12, art. 1: "a fide christiana recessio"; Paul III, "Cum ex apostolatus," Feb. 15, 1559, § 2.

3 Thus also Avanzini, De Constitutione Apostolicae Sedis, ed. 6, 1883, p. 4; Ballerini-Palmieri, Opus Theol. Morale, Vol. VII, n. 422, p. 219 (ed. 2).

4 S. O., July 28, 1847; Aug. 4, 1856 (Coll. P. F., nn. 1018, 1128); Pennacchi, Commentaria in Const. Ap. Sedis, 1883, Vol. I, p. 83.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This separation, too, may take place with or without forming or clinging to schismatic doctrines. Since the Vatican Council, schism is generally connected with heresy. For pure schism, i. e., mere disobedience to the lawful head of the Church, without at least a speculative positive doubt in her divinity, is not easily possible, except in individuals.[5]

The crime of apostasy, heresy, or schism must be exteriorly manifested, either in words, writings, or acts which betray defection from the Christian Church, denial of some article of faith, or separation from the unity of the Church, according to can. 2195, §1; because merely internal apostasy, heresy, or schism do not belong to the external forum and therefore are not intended here.[6] From merely internal transgressions, even though they be grievously sinful, any confessor may absolve.

2) The penalties here enunciated are twofold: censure and vindictive penalties; besides, a distinction is drawn, according to can. 2207, n. 1, by reason of dignity, between laymen and clerics.

a) The censure inflicted is excommunication incurred ipso facto, which per se requires not even a declaratory sentence. Only if, in the prudent judgment of the superior, the public welfare should require such a sentence, it must be pronounced.[7] The bonum publicum certainly demands it in the case of clergymen. Note that the term moniti (§1, n. 2) does not refer to the in-

5 Thus the Greek schismatics, the Jansenists, and the "Old Catholics" are no less heretics than schismatics; also the National Italian Catholics; see D'Annibale, In Constitutionem Ap. Sedis, ed. 1894, p. 34.

6 See Hollweck, l. c., p. 162; D'Annibale, l. c., says it does not matter whether the words or facts betraying the crime were heard or witnessed by bystanders; they are public if they could have been heard or seen (l. c., p. 24).

7 See can. 2223, § 4; also can. 2232.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

curring of the censure. Consequently, no canonical warning or admonition is required.[8]

b) The vindictive penalties inflicted are:

For laymen: privation of all offices and pensions they may hold in the Church, and infamy.

For clerics: privation of every benefice, dignity, pension, office, or charge which they may hold; also infamy and, after a fruitless warning, deposition.

A warning must precede these vindictive penalties, and we suppose the warning must be administered according to can. 2143, i. e., before an official of the diocese or two witnesses, or by registered letter. The infamy inflicted on both laymen and clergymen, and the deposition pronounced against clerics, are ferendae sententiae.[9]

Deposition requires a second warning after the first one has been served, with the threat of privation and infamy.

3). The vindictive penalties are rendered more severe in two cases, which may be distinct, but may also occur by one and the same act: sectae acatholicae nomen dare or publice adhaerere.

A sect means a religious society established in opposition to the Church, whether it consist of infidels, pagans, Jews, Moslems, non-Catholics, or schismatics.[10] To become a member of such a society (nomen dare) means to inscribe one's name on its roster. Of course, it is presumed that the new member knows it is a non-Catholic society, otherwise he would not incur the censure. If he hears of the censure after he has become a 8 Pennacchi, l. c., I, p. 101 f.

9 See can. 2223, § 3. Formerly these penalties were incurred ipso iure, Hollweck, l. c., p. 162 f.

10 D'Annibale, l. c., p. 79.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

member, and promptly severs his connection, the penalty is not incurred.[11]

The text also provides for cases of informal membership. Publice adhaerere means to belong publicly to a non-Catholic sect. This may be done by frequenting its services without any special cause or reason, or by boasting of being a member, though not enrolled, by wearing a badge or emblem indicative of membership, etc. Those guilty of such conduct, whether laymen or clerics, render themselves infamous (infamia iuris latae sententiae) and consequently can. 2294, § 1 must be applied to them.[12] A cleric must, besides, be degraded if, after having been duly warned, he persists in being a member of such a society. All the offices he may hold become vacant, ipso facto, without any further declaration. This is tacit resignation recognized by law,[13] and therefore the vacancy is one de facto et iure. It need hardly be added that excommunication follows in each case, although the vindictive penalties only are mentioned in 2° and 3°.

It may not be amiss to add that the penalties decreed for apostasy, heresy, and schism, presuppose malice (dolus) as explained above in can. 2200. Consequently, if one would retain the Christian faith interiorly, but act exteriorly as an apostate or heretic,— which would be detestable hypocrisy,— he would not incur the penalties in foro interno,[14] but in foro externo the presumption 11 Can. 2202, § 1; Hollweck, l. c., p. 170.

12 Privation of benefices, etc., mentioned in can. 2314, § 1, n. 2, is not repeated in n. 3, because included in the infamia iuris. Note that irregularity is attached to this infamy; can. 984, n. 5.

13 Can. 188, n. 4.

14 Therefore any confessor may absolve him in the sacramental forum; Hollweck, l. c., p. 163, note 5.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google would be against him, and the proof of his internal defection would be incumbent on the one who asserted it, according to can. 2200, §2.

§2 Treats of absolution in the internal and external forum, and of abjuration.

1°. Absolution from excommunication, mentioned in §1, is reserved to the Apostolic See speciali modo, as far as it is to be imparted in the court of conscience only. Concerning this absolution, the rules laid down in can. 2248–2254 must be consulted; in cases of reasonable doubt, can. 209. Ordinaries need a special faculty to absolve from this censure.[15]

2°. Absolution in the external forum may be imparted by the local Ordinary (but not by the vicar-general, without special commission) in the following circumstances:

a) If the crime of apostasy, heresy, or schism has been in any way brought before the external court of the local Ordinary;

b) If the delinquent is repentant, and

c) If he abjures his error in juridical form and complies with all other prescribed conditions.

Ad a) Juridically the crime is before the external court of the local Ordinary if a summons has been duly issued. However, since the Code adds: "quoquo modo ad forum deductum," we may adopt the opinion of St. Alphonsus, that it would be sufficient if the crime had been proved to the ecclesiastical judge by at least one witness.[16] This is all the more acceptable since our text admits voluntary confession, which certainly can be made in writing or 15 Apostolic Delegates enjoy this faculty; see Index Facultatum, May 6, 1919, n. 4.

16 Putzer, Comment. in Facult. Apost., ed. 4, p. 24, n. 17.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

through another person. This is nothing else but the sponte comparere, to appear of one's own accord, before the Holy Office or the local Ordinary,— a formula found in former decisions.[17]

Ad b) Repentance is supposed to be effected by a spontaneous accusation, but it also means that a relapse should be dealt with more severely, although the Code does not make it a condition of absolution.[18]

Ad c) Abjuration must be made according to the formula contained in the Roman Pontifical and Ritual.[19] It is a juridical abjuration if made before the local Ordinary or his delegate and at least two witnesses. Hence the vicar-general, or the rural dean, or any other priest may be delegated for the purpose. Note, however, that religious superiors; as such, even though exempt, cannot receive this juridical abjuration, because it appertains to matters of faith, in which they are not competent,[20] though, of course, they may act as delegates of the local ordinary.

Here it may be proper to call attention to the regulations issued by the Holy Office concerning the manner of absolution in cases of doubtful baptism.[21] The same S. Congregation has ruled that boys and girls under fourteen years of age need not pronounce the abjuration, but 17 S. O., June 21, 1672; Jan. 3, 1648 (Coll. P. F., nn. 31, 98). Hence, in case of converts being received, the priest (pastor or assistant, curate) may simply take down in writing the confession of the convert and write a letter to the bishop, informing him that he witnessed the voluntary confession and asking for delegation to receive the abjuration in the presence of two witnesses.

18 S. O., Jan. 21, 1627, l. c.

19 Pont. Rom., P. III, tit. "Ordo ad Reconciliandum Apostatam, Schismaticum vel Haereticum." Rit. Rom., tit. III, cap, 3; S. O., Aug. 28, 1861 (Coll. P. F., n. 1221).

20 Can. 501, § 2.

21 S. O., July 20, 1859 (Coll. cit., n. 1178); also to be found in the priest's New Ritual, published by various editors, under the title Reception of Converts.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

should make a simple profession of faith, after which they may be reconciled to the Church.[22]

These are the servanda de iure, viz.: assurance of Baptism, sacramental confession, and a wholesome penance.[23]

4) After being absolved in the external forum, the penitent may be absolved from his sin by any confessor in the court of conscience[24] (can. 2251). Why absolution in foro externo is required, can be gathered from certain decisions of the Holy Office. The reason is that the penitent might otherwise, if his crime became notorious or public, be prosecuted by the Holy Office or the local Ordinary. Hence he should be given a certificate of absolution.[25] This is all the more important, since the other penalties are not lifted by this absolution, which refers only to excommunication. Therefore a dispensation from the vindictive penalties should be imparted, according to can. 2289.[26] A layman, for instance, who held a title or decoration or order of knighthood from the Pope, would have lost that dignity, and therefore a dispensation would be required. However, it appears conformable to the mind of the legislator that the Ordinary, who can absolve from the heavier penalty (excommunication), should also be entitled to dispense from the vindictive penalty.

22 S. O., March 8, 1882 (Coll. cit., n. 1566.)

23 S. O., July 30, 1806 (ib., n. 688).

24 It is hardly necessary to add that the local Ordinary may do all this personally. Attention may be drawn to can. 199, § 1, concerning delegation; for the power mentioned in can. 2314, § 2, is ordinary, and may therefore be delegated. Wherefore the Ordinary may habitually delegate any priest to receive so-called juridical abjurations before two witnesses. This may be done at a synod or when issuing the so-called faculties.

25 S. O., Jan. 3, 1640; May 7, 1822 (Coll. P. F., nn. 98, 771).

26 Said canon refers to can. 2236, which requires papal dispensation.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

SUSPICION OF HERESY

Can. 2315

Suspectus de haeresi, qui monitus causam suspicionis non removeat, actibus legitimis prohibeatur, et clericus praeterea, repetita inutiliter monitione, suspendatur a divinis; quod si intra sex menses a contracta poena completos suspectus de haeresi sese non emendaverit, habeatur tanquam haereticus, haereticorum poenis obnoxius.

Suspicion, in the psychological sense, is doubt, coupled with a positive leaning to one side; — in our case, towards a heretical doctrine. In law it may be expressed by presumption or circumstantial evidence. It is, therefore, a judgment formed about some one without sufficient evidence on the ground of certain indicia.

Three kinds of suspicion are generally distinguished: light, vehement, and violent. Light suspicion admits of no conclusion, because it is based on absolutely insufficient indicia. Vehement suspicion rests on effective signs and conclusions. Violent suspicion amounts to morally certain proof.[1]

The Decretals,[2] from which the notion "suspicion of heresy" is taken, have in view vehement suspicion, and no doubt this is here to be understood. Light suspicion often amounts to no more than rash judgment, whilst violent suspicion is to be considered as a positive proof, and therefore rather falls under can. 2314. That the

[1] Suarez, De Fide, disp. XXIV, sect. 2, n. 1 (ed. Paris., 1858, t. 12, p. 592).

[2] See c. 14, X, II, 23; c. 10, X, V, 34.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

limits between vehement and violent suspicion cannot be very clearly set off, is owing to the nature of circumstantial evidence.

Formerly jurisprudence used to resort to an expedient which seemed to ward off vehement as well as violent suspicion. It was the so-called purgatio canonica, or canonically admitted proof of one's innocence of an imputed crime. The reception of Holy Communion or the celebration of Mass were accepted as such proofs. But these means gave way to a more juridical means of purging oneself of suspicion, the iuramentum purgatorium, an oath administered by the judge in order to disperse a suspicion.[3]

Our canon, too, mentions a removal of heresy, or rather of the cause that gave rise to suspicion. But in what this removal consists, is not expressly stated. This is quite natural, for the different cases of suspected heresy permit a different way of removing suspicion.

The Code declares the following persons as suspect of heresy:

1. The propagators of heresy and those who participate with non-Catholics in divinis (Can. 2316);

2. Those who contract marriage under the condition of having their offspring educated in a non-Catholic sect and those who have their children baptized by non-Catholic ministers or educated in a non-Catholic denomination (can. 2319);

3. Those who desecrate sacred hosts or species (can. 2320);

4. Those who appeal from the Pope to a general council (can. 2332);

[3] Reiffenstuel, C. V, tit. 34, n. 1 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

5. Those who remain under sentence of excommunication for more than a year (can. 2340);

6. Those who administer or receive the Sacraments simoniacally (can. 2371).

As may be seen from this list, each species of suspicion here enumerated may be removed in a different way: by formal retraction, by withdrawing the condition and complying with Catholic principles, or by protesting against what was done or received, for instance, returning the money received from simony, or giving up the sacred species. We do not, however, hesitate to say that the judge may in each case demand a guarantee of genuine amendment, in fact, he should do so, unless he is convinced of the sincerity of the penitent. Neither would the judge exceed his power if he would require an oath or a statement in presence of two witnesses.

We now proceed to the penalties the Code inflicts on those suspected of heresy.

a) They must, first, be warned, according to can. 2307, to remove the cause of suspicion. A reasonable time should be granted for this purpose in the canonical warning.

b) If the warning proves fruitless, the suspected person must be forbidden to perform any ecclesiastical legal acts, according to can. 2256. If he is a cleric, he must be suspended a divinis,[4] after a second warning has been left unheeded.

c) If, after the lapse of six months, to be reckoned from the moment the penalty has been contracted, the person suspected of heresy has not amended, he must be regarded as a heretic, amenable to the penalties set forth in can. 2314. Whilst the penalties enumerated under

4 See can. 2279, § 2, n. 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(b) are ferendae sententiae, to be inflicted according to can. 2223, §3, the penalties stated under (c) are a iure and latae sententiae.[5]

Note that, since the ferendae sententiae penalties require a canonical warning and a clear statement of the time granted, the moment from which the penalty is contracted can be almost mathematically determined.

COÖPERATION IN HERESY

Can. 2316

Qui quoquo modo haeresis propagationem sponte et scienter iuvat, aut qui communicat in divinis cum haereticis contra praescriptum can. 1258, suspectus de haeresi est.

This crime is singled out as a species for itself, and the penalty is taken partly from older sources and partly from the Bull "Apostolicae Sedis.[1]" Two distinct cases are contained in our canon, and the penalty is the same as for those suspected of heresy.

1. Whosoever spontaneously and knowingly assists in any way in the propagation of heresy, is himself suspected of heresy. Under this heading fall, according to "Apostolicae Sedis," all those who believe the errors of heretics, or who receive, protect, and defend heretics. There is little doubt[2] that our text includes all these,

5 See can. 2217, § 1, 2. Where the phrase similia verba indicates that though the terms a iure or latae sententiae are not expressly used, equivalent terms, as in our canon 2315: habeatur tanquam haereticus, haereticorum ponis obnoxius, mean the same.

1 L. c., see note under can. 2314.

2 This seems to be indicated also in the notes of Card. Gasparri to this canon.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

provided, of course, they act of their own accord and knowingly. Hence

a) Credentes are such as externally profess the errors of heretics, e. g., by asserting that Luther or Döllinger were correct in their views, even though they may not know the particular errors of these leaders.[3]

b) Receptores are those who receive and shelter heretics, especially with the intention of hiding them from the ecclesiastical authorities.[4]

c) Fautores are such as favor heretics because of their heresy, by omitting to denounce them when required or demanded by their office, or by giving support to non-Catholic propaganda, This latter way of propagating heresy is followed by public and private persons who write for heretics, praise their methods and objects, recommend their work and give it material support, always provided that the heresy itself is the object of their mental and material favors.[5]

d) Defensores means those who defend heretics for the sake of heresy, orally, in writing, or by acts of defence proper. All such persons are suspected of heresy if they act of their own accord and knowingly. Sponte is opposed to compulsion and fear, and therefore implies full deliberation and a free will not hindered by any extrinsic or intrinsic impediment, such as fear of losing an office, or one's reputation, or customers. Scienter is opposed to ignorance, the object of which here is heresy, and means that these promotors or propagators of heresy must be

3 D'Annibale, l. c., p. 24; Avanzini, l. c., p. 8, n. 5, who justly observes that they may not be heretics if they profess these errors only in a mechanical way.

4 D'Annibale, l. c., p. 12, n. 12; this was important in former times on account of the office of inquisitors; Hollweck, l. c., p. 165.

5 D'Annibale, l. c., p. 24, n. 32: "intuitu haeresis"; Hollweck, l. c., p. 164 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:58 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

aware that they are helping heresy as such. Besides, as iuvare propagationem seems to imply an effective propaganda, it may be said that these fautores, etc., must produce an effect. However, this is rarely wanting if the support is a material one.[6]

2. Those who communicate with heretics in divinis are themselves suspect of heresy. Here we refer to can. 1258, where the necessary explanation has been given.[7]

3. These and all others suspected of heresy incur the penalty stated in can. 2315.

TEACHING AND DEFENDING CONDEMNED DOCTRINES

Can. 2317

Pertinaciter docentes vel defendentes sive publice sive privatim doctrinam, quae ab Apostolica Sede vel a Concilio Generali damnata quidem fuit, sed non uti formaliter haeretica, arceantur a ministerio praedicandi verbum Dei audiendive sacramentales confessiones et a quolibet docendi munere, salvis aliis poenis quas sententia damnationis forte statuerit, vel quas Ordinarius, post monitionem, necessarias ad reparandum scandalum duxerit.

This canon is a modified repetition of a passage in the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis.[1] We say modified, because the penalty of excommunication latae sententiae

6 Ibid. an example: those who contribute to non-Catholic propaganda are guilty of coöperation.

7 See Vol. VI of this Commentary, p. 192 ff.

1 § II, 1: "Docentes vel defendentes sive publice, sive privatim propositiones ab Apostolica Sede damnatas sub excommunicationis poena latae sententiae; item docentes vel defendentes tanquam licitam praxim inquirendi a poenitente nomen complicis, prouti damnata est a Benedicto XIV. in Const. Suprema 7. Julii 1745; Ubi primum 2. Julii 1746; Ad eradicandum 28. Septembris 1746."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

is changed into another. Besides our canon mentions doctrine, while the aforesaid papal constitution referred to propositions. Materially speaking there can hardly be any difference between doctrines and propositions, except that the former is a somewhat wider term comprising formulated propositions as well as errors which have not yet been cast into theses.

The text says: All who obstinately teach or either publicly or in private defend a doctrine that has been condemned by the Apostolic See or by an ecumenical council, but not as a formal heresy, are to be excluded from the ministry of preaching the word of God or hearing confessions, and from the office of teaching. This in addition to the penalties which the sentence of condemnation decrees against them and the penalties which the Ordinary, after a due warning, may consider necessary in order to repair the scandal given.

1. The persons here intended are those who teach or defend condemned doctrines. To teach means to communicate something to others who are ignorant thereof, with the intention of convincing them.[2] To defend signifies to take some one under one's protection, especially if he is attacked. Hence a mere assertion, proposal or profession of a condemned doctrine would not be a defence.[3] The defence, however, must be of the false doctrine itself; to protect a person who was condemned would not be a defence in the sense of our canon.

2. A false doctrine may be taught or defended either in public or privately. The defence is public if done in a public place, such as a pulpit, or a school, or an open

2 Thus Hollweck, l. c., p. 166, note 3. D'Annibale, says (l. c., p. 71): "docere est, nescientibus tradere"; but this is too wide a definition.

3 Hollweck, l. c.; D'Annibale, l. c.; Pennacchi, l. c., I, 458 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

meeting. It is private if individuals are approached in conversation by chance or appointment. It makes no difference whether the teaching or defending is done in writing or orally.[4]

3. The object of this teaching or defence must be a doctrine condemned by the Apostolic See or by a general council, though not as a formal heresy. By Apostolic See, of course, is understood the whole Roman Court, consisting of the Sacred Congregations, Tribunals, and Offices (can. 7), more especially the Holy Office, which is the competent judge in matters of faith. A general council, according to can. 222, must have the Roman Pontiff as its head.

The term doctrine, as already observed, is somewhat wider than "propositions," used in the "Apostolicae Sedis." Propositions are brief sentences, generally taken from the works of suspected authors, cast into the form of a canon, and accompanied by a theological censure or note, the grading of which has become almost stereotyped, which is a great advantage because it admits of a precise theological-moral classification [5] of objectionable doctrines.

A proposition is haeretica if opposed to a truth clearly proposed by the Church as de fide.

A proposition is erronea if opposed to the theological teaching commonly held in the Church, though not proposed as de fide.

[4] Hollweck, l. c.; D'Annibale, l. c. p. 71. Public may also imply a person in a public capacity, and private a person in private position, although this significance is not directly intended in the text; but neither is it excluded, for, as a rule, a public person exercises more influence than a private person.

[5] See Franzelin, S. J., Tractatus de Divina Traditione et Scriptura, ed. 4, 1896, p. 141 ff., sect. II, scholion to thes. XII; Pennacchi, I, 149 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A propositio temeraria differs from an erronea only in degree; it is less offensive than an erroneous proposition because less repugnant to the teaching of the Church.[6]

A proposition is called male sonans if its wording may be taken in a good sense, yet, according to common parlance within the Church, sounds very suspicious.[7]

Piarum aurium offensiva is a proposition which is opposed to the common belief or sentiment of the faithful.

We may safely say that all these propositions,— with the exception of haeretica, which belongs to heresy proper, — are included in the text. But as the term doctrine is employed, it should be clearly understood that, when a doctrinal system as such, like Modernism, is condemned, no specific propositions need be mentioned as condemned.

In chronological[8] order the following propositions and doctrines fall under can. 2317:

a) The errors of Wiclif and Hus, as censured in the Constitution of Martin V, "Inter cunctas," of Feb. 22, 1418;

b) The errors of Luther — in so far as they are not formally heretical — as condemned by Leo X, "Exsurge Domine," of June 15, 1520;

c) The proposition condemned by Clement VIII, June 20, 1602, styling as false, rash, and scandalous the assertion that confession and absolution could be made by letter or message;

d) The 45 propositions condemned by the Holy Office in its decrees of Sept. 24, 1665 and March 18, 1666;

6 Cfr. "Auctorem fidei," prop. 26.

7 Ibid., prop. 44, 45.

8 See Avanzini, l. c., p. 117 ff.; they are also found in Denzinger's Enchiridion.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

e) The 65 propositions condemned by the Holy Office on March 4, 1679, as "scandalous and pernicious in practice";

f) The 68 propositions of Michael de Molinos, condemned by the Constitution of Innocent XI, "Coelestis Pater," of Nov. 20, 1687, partly as heretical, partly as suspected, erroneous, scandalous, etc.;

g) One proposition condemned by Alexander VIII, Aug. 24, 1690, and 31 condemned by the same Pope, Dec. 7, 1690;

h) The 101 propositions of Paschasius Quesnel, condemned by Clement XI, in the Bull "Unigenitus," Sept. 8, 1713 and again in the "Pastoralis Officii," Aug. 28, 1718;

i) Five propositions condemned by Benedict XIV, "Detestabilem," Nov. 10, 1752;

k) 85 propositions of the Synod of Pistoja, condemned by Pius VI, "Auctorem fidei," Aug. 28, 1894;

l) Finally, the errors of the Modernists, in so far as they are not formally heretical.[9]

The errors censured in the Syllabus of Pius IX and Pius X's "Lamentabili" must be judged according to the censure attached to each.[10]

4) The penalties attached to the transgression of this law, for clergymen, consists in the withdrawal of their faculties. Laymen guilty of this delinquency must be removed from the teaching office (a quolibet docendi

9 Pius X, "Praestantia Scripturae," Nov. 18, 1907 (Anal. Eccl., XV, 435); "Sacrorum Antistitum," Sept. 1, 1910 (A. Ap. S., II, 701 ff.).

10 Concerning the Syllabus of Pius IX,— which Card. Gasparri omits from his notes,— the question whether it is a dogmatic definition belongs to the theologians; here it enters only in as far as a doctrine condemned by the Apostolic See is concerned.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

munere), which includes all professorships in schools, colleges, universities, etc.

The clause "salvis aliis poenis quas sententia damnationis forte statuerit" concerns the future, not the past. The "Exsurge Domine" of Leo X (§4) enumerates several such penalties, and the Motu proprio of Pius X, "Praestantia scripturae," contains the same clause in almost identical words. But these penalties must be considered as abrogated, according to can. 6, n. 5, otherwise there would be a flagrant contradiction, and hence statuerit must be taken as the future.

If the Ordinary deems it necessary to add other penalties, he must first issue an admonition, according to canons 2143 and 2309. He is not obliged to inflict other penalties, but may do so if he deems it expedient (see can. 2223).

PENALTIES IN REGARD TO FORBIDDEN BOOKS

Can. 2318

§ 1. In excommunicationem Sedi Apostolicae speciali modo reservatam ipso facto incurrunt, opere publici iuris facto, editores librorum apostatarum, haereticorum et schismaticorum, qui apostasiam, haeresim, schisma propugnant, itemque eosdem libros aliosve per apostolicas litteras nominatim prohibitos defendentes aut scienter sine debita licentia legentes vel retinentes.

§ 2. Auctores et editores qui sine debita licentia sacrarum Scripturarum libros vel earum adnotationes aut commentarios imprimi curant, incidunt ipso facto in excommunicationem nemini reservatam.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 1. Those who publish books written by apostates, heretics, or schismatics, incur the excommunication reserved speciali modo to the Holy See, after the book has been effectively published. The same penalty is incurred by those who defend such books or others nominally forbidden by Apostolic letter, or who knowingly read or retain them without due permission.

§ 2. Authors and publishers who print books of Sacred Scripture, or annotations and commentaries thereon, without due permission, incur the excommunication reserved to no one. After what was said elsewhere[1] a few remarks may suffice.

1. The persons who incur this penalty are:

a) The editores of the books named, by which term are to be understood the author himself as well as the publisher, but not the printers and their co-workers. The editors, whether they undertake the publication in their own name, or under an assumed name, or anonymously, incur the penalty only after the edition is complete and for sale, opere publici iuris facto.

b) Those who defend[2] books forbidden under this canon or read or retain them without the necessary permission and knowingly, i. e., being aware that they are forbidden.

2. The books forbidden here under the penalty stated in §1, are those of apostates, heretics, and schismatics, which not merely propose, but defend apostasy, heresy, or schism. The defence may concern only one heretical doctrine. The term "book" must here be strictly interpreted and hence can. 1384, § 2 cannot be applied.

1 See Vol. VI of this Commentary, p. 428 ff.

2 By defending the contents, or protecting the book from being destroyed or given up; Eichmann, l. c., p. 132.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Consequently pamphlets, magazines, leaflets, papers, etc., are not comprised under this penal sanction. Besides, the "books" must be forbidden by Apostolic letter, wherefore decrees of the Holy Office or any other S. Congregation forbidding certain books do not fall under this heading, even though the decree may have been issued "facto verbo cum SSmo." On the other hand it does not matter whether these Apostolic letters are issued in the form of a brief, or bull or encyclical letter, or any other.

3. The penalty is excommunication reserved speciali modo to the Apostolic See; it is incurred ipso facto, i. e., by the fact of having published such a forbidden book, or defended, read, or retained it, according to the explanation given in Title XXIII, Book III.

Here it may be added that the Ordinary may, in virtue of can. 1402, grant permission to read and retain books forbidden by common law (can. 1399) or by a decree of the Apostolic See (Holy Office), but he cannot grant permission to read and retain books forbidden by Apostolic letter.

§ 2. Another category of books is mentioned in § 2 of can. 2318: the authors and publishers of books of Sacred Scripture or of annotations and commentaries thereon,[3] if printed without due permission.[4] All these incur excommunication reserved to no one, from which any confessor may absolve, according to can. 2253, 1°.

MIXED MARRIAGES AND NON-CATHOLIC EDUCATION

Can. 2319

§ 1. Subsunt excommunicationi latae sententiae Ordinario reservatae catholici:

3 Cfr. can. 1385, § 1, n. 1; 1391; 1399; 1400.

4 This means to have them printed for publication or sale, not

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1°. Qui matrimonium ineunt coram ministro acatholico contra praescriptum can. 1063, § 1;

2°. Qui matrimonio uniuntur cum pacto explicito vel implicito ut omnis vel aliqua proles educetur extra catholicam Ecclesiam;

3°. Qui scienter liberos suos acatholicis ministris baptizandos offerre praesumunt;

4°. Parentes vel parentum locum tenentes qui liberos in religione acatholica educandos vel instituendos scienter tradunt.

§2. Ii de quibus in § 1, nn. 2-4, sunt praeterea suspecti de haeresi.

This canon states four different cases, all of which have to do with family life in relation to the Catholic faith. Common to all four is the penalty of excommunication latae sententiae, reserved to the Ordinary. Three of them, besides, fall under the suspicion of heresy, which must be judged according to can. 2316.

1. Those who contract marriage before a non-Catholic minister, against can. 1063, §1, incur the aforesaid excommunication, but do not become suspected of heresy. It is, of course, immaterial whether one or both parties belong to the Catholic faith. For the rest, we refer to can. 1063 and its explanation.

2. Those who contract marriage with the implied or express agreement that all or some of the children shall be educated outside the Catholic Church, incur the aforesaid excommunication and, besides, are suspected of heresy. This crime is against can. 1061, §1, n. 2, which requires a promise that all the offspring shall be for one's own use; in the latter case, the censure would not be incurred.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

educated in the Catholic Church in case of a mixed marriage. Of course, if two Catholics should marry under the same condition, they, too, would incur the penalty.

The text mentions a twofold agreement (pactum), one express and the other implied. Express contracts or agreements are those the terms of which are openly uttered and avowed at the time of the making. Implied are such as reason and justice dictate, and which, therefore, the law presumes that every man undertakes to perform, and upon this presumption makes him answerable to those who suffer from his non-performance. This distinction refers only to the mode of proof.[1] Yet it will serve our purpose; for the agreement must be either a legal or an informal one, i. e., a mutual promise or consent by two or more persons. An express agreement would be one made in legal and written terms, as the so-called reversals usually are. An implied contract would be an agreement or promise made by one of the parties to comply with the conditions, though iniquitous, of the civil law that the boys should follow the religion of the father and the girls that of the mother.[2]

A mere reluctant silence on the part of the Catholic party, inspired by the desire not to cause a disturbance, could not be styled an agreement. On the other hand, regret after the promise was made would not save the Catholic party from incurring the censure. Neither would the promise made to have only the first-born boy educated in a non-Catholic sect offset the effects of this canon. Finally, it may be observed that the text says:

1 See Harriman, Contracts, 1901, § II.

2 Pius VIII, "Litteris altero," March 25, 1830 (Coll. P. F., n. 811).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

"extra catholicam Ecclesiam," which implies total exclusion of the Catholic religion and its principles. It involves either omission of Catholic education, i. e., indifferentism, or a positively sectarian or infidel training.

3°. Those who knowingly dare to offer their children to non-Catholic ministers for baptism incur excommunication reserved to the Ordinary and, besides, are suspected of heresy.

a) Here the parents are intended, because the text says: "suos liberos," their children. Therefore, if a midwife or nurse should commit this crime without the knowledge of the parents, the latter would not be subject to this penalty. On the other hand, the word "suos" cannot be interpreted as if the parents would not incur the penalty if they commanded or even permitted such an act. Here Regula Iuris 72 in 6° finds application: "What one does through another, is as if he did it himself." Can. 2209, §3, also applies and consequently the coöperation must be judged according to this canon. But a nurse or midwife would not incur the penalty, even though she was guilty of such an unqualified interference with parental rights of her own accord.

b) The words "scienter praesumpserint" must be interpreted according to can. 2229, §2. Therefore any notable lessening of responsibility, either on the part of the intellect or of the will, would render one immune from incurring the penalty latae sententiae. A case to the point is that mentioned in a decision of the Holy Office.[3] Some Irish mothers, for fear of pecuniary fines, had presented their children to Protestant ministers. They committed a grievous sin, but did not incur the [3] S. O., Nov. 29, 1672, ad 2 (Coll. P. F., n. 205).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google penalty stated in our canon.[4] If the parents were deceived as to the true denomination of an intruding sectarian, imputability would be wanting, and consequently the penalty would not be incurred.

4. Parents or those who hold their place, if they knowingly offer children to be educated or brought up in a non-Catholic denomination, incur the aforesaid penalty of excommunication and are suspected of heresy.

a) Here not only parents, but also guardians or tutors, are included. It is irrelevant whether the guardians are legally appointed, or have assumed authority over the children of their own accord, or with the connivance and approval of the parents.

b) The act which is here declared punishable, is that of educating or bringing up the child in a non-Catholic religion. This may be done either in sectarian schools, properly so-called, or by means of private tutors and teachers, either systematically or without method. The public schools of our country are not supposed to be sectarian.

c) The adverb scienter presupposes that the anti-Catholic tendency of the school or teacher was known to the parent or guardian.[5]

4 We know of tricks played on poor Italian mothers by unscrupulous proselytizing ministers, who offered twenty lire to be allowed to baptize a baby.

5 See can. 2229, § 2.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XII

CRIMES AGAINST RELIGION

The delinquencies enumerated in this title are directed partly against the Catholic faith and partly against the religious sentiments common to all whose religious and, we might add, natural instincts are not entirely perverted. All of them offend against the inborn respect of the faithful for the sacred things which are closely connected with religion.

DESECRATION OF CONSECRATED SPECIES

Can. 2320

Qui species consecratas abiecerit vel ad malum finem abduxerit aut retinuerit, est suspectus de haeresi; incurrit in excommunicationem latae sententiae specialissimo modo Sedi Apostolicae reservatam; est ipso facto infamis, et clericus praeterea est deponendus.

The crime here mentioned was perpetrated by fanatics imbued with the heretical tendencies of the Manichæans, against whom the papal inquisitors proceeded severely, but not without encountering difficulties on the part of some Catholics. These outcasts abused the sacred hosts for magic and diabolical purposes, trying them on products and animals.[1] But the Inquisition alone could not

1 Hadrian VI, "Dudum," July 20, 1522 (Bull. Luxemb., 1727, I, 625).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

eradicate this evil. Hence the popes decreed severe penalties against all such malefactors of whatever dignity, condition, or age, provided they had attained the twentieth year.[2] The penalty of being delivered to the secular authority, which generally inflicted capital punishment, was at first condoned if the culprits confessed the crime of their own accord. But Clement XIII abolished this mitigation.[3] Clerics were formerly degraded and then delivered up to the secular power. Our Code decrees as follows: Whoever throws away the sacred species, or carries them away for evil purposes, or retains them, is suspected of heresy, incurs excommunication latae sententiae, reserved modo specialissimo to the Apostolic See; he is ipso facto infamous, and, if a cleric, shall be deposed.

In explaining this canon we shall follow the Constitution of Benedict XIV.

1. Whoever (qui) means any person, layman or ecclesiastic, of the highest as well as lowest rank or dignity, and no privilege, exemption, or indult shall protect one guilty of such a crime.[4]

2. The text says, furthermore, that the crime must be committed with consecrated species. The aforesaid Constitution mentioned sacred hosts, thereby intimating that consecrated wine, i. e., the Sacred Blood, is not so easily exposed to sacrilege. Our text includes both bread and wine, provided they are consecrated. When consecration may be legitimately presumed, Benedict XIV de-

2 Innocent XI, "Ad nostri Apostolatus," March 12, 1677; Alexander VIII, "Cum alias," Dec. 22, 1690, embodied in Bened. XIV, "Ab augustissimo," March 5, 1744.

3 "Gravissimum," March 6, 1759, § 6 (Continuatio Bull., ed. Prati, 1842, I, 114).

4 From this excommunication are exempted cardinals, but not bishops; see can. 2227, § 2.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

scribes as follows: if hosts or particles are preserved in a repository, tabernacle, pyxis, or ostensorium, the legal presumption is that they are consecrated. The same presumption holds if a communicant should take a particle of the host out of his mouth after Holy Communion. Against this presumption conclusive and evident proofs are admitted, which means that at least two first-class sworn witnesses must prove the contrary, viz., that the hosts were not consecrated. Such a proof, unless the minister who presumptively consecrated the sacred species should testify under oath to the contrary, could hardly be furnished; and therefore the presumption might just as well be called iuris et de iure.[5]

3. The acts by which this penalty is incurred are described as: abiicere, abducere, retinere. The first designates the act of intentional throwing away or spitting out. Accidental vomiting, sickly or sudden jerking or coughing does not, of course, constitute irreverence. The second term (abducere) denotes a carrying away of the sacred host, either violently (by robbery) or secretly, together with the sacred vessels or without them. The sacred species may be retained in places where they should not be kept, i. e., in private homes, on one's own person, always supposing that this, like abducere, is done for an evil purpose. For the abiicere no evil purpose is required; the act alone is sufficient to constitute the crime in question. An evil purpose is legally presumed if the sacred species are carried away or retained. If these two acts are proved it is not necessary to prove

5 See can. 1825 f.

6 The purpose would also be evil if the sacred species were stolen or retained in order to hand them over to heretics, infidels, Freemasons, etc., or if they were used for superstitious purposes, for witchcraft or magic; Hadrian VI, "Dudum."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the bad intention.[6] Therefore the defendant himself must prove conclusively that he had no bad intention. Thus Benedict XIV in the aforesaid Constitution.

4. The penalties are somewhat mitigated, inasmuch as the delivering up of the culprit to the secular arm is not mentioned, and degradation (in case of clergymen) is changed into deposition ferendae sententiæ. The infamy mentioned in our Canon is that of law (infamia iuris), with all the effects mentioned in can. 2294, §1.

VIOLATION OF THE LAWS OF BINATION AND FASTING

Can. 2321

Sacerdotes qui contra praescripta can. 806, § 1, 808 praesumpserint Missam eodem die iterare vel eam celebrare non ieiuni, suspendantur a Missae celebratione ad tempus ab Ordinario secundum diversa rerum adiuncta praefiniendum.

Priests who dare to say Mass twice a day against the ruling of can. 806, §1, or who presumptuously say Mass without fasting, contrary to can. 808, should be suspended by the Ordinary from saying Mass for a time, the duration of which should be determined by circumstances.

Enough has been said concerning bination and fasting in connection with previous canons. As to the penal character, we may add:

1°. The term presumption is attached to both transgressions, and consequently can. 2229, §2 must be here applied. Any reason, therefore, of (not affected) ignorance, or fear, or physical incapacity, would diminish imputability. But since the penalty is not latae sententiae, these reasons do not entirely exempt one from incurring it. One decision of the Holy Office indeed reads that fear of scandal or astonishment would not justify a priest in saying a second Mass if he had broken the fast.[1] However, since our text expressly adds the term praesumpserint, it evidently admits a diminution of imputability and implies that the transgression must be a rash one.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2°. Suspension, even though only temporary, belongs to the class of vindictive penalties (can. 2298, n. 2), and consequently requires a judiciary procedure.[2] Its duration is to be measured by circumstances. These may be serious, on account of scandal or bad example, but may also depend on the need of priests, local conditions, etc.[3]

SAYING MASS AND HEARING CONFESSIONS BY PERSONS NOT PRIESTS

Can. 2322

Ad ordinem sacerdotalem non promotus:

1°. Si Missae celebrationem simulaverit aut sacramentalem confessionem exceperit, excommunicationem ipso facto contrahit, speciali modo Sedi Apostolicae reservatam; et insuper laicus quidem privetur pensione aut munere, si quod habeat in Ecclesia, aliisque poenis pro gravitate culpae puniatur; clericus vero deponatur;

2°. Si alia munia sacerdotalia usurpaverit, ab Ordinario pro gravitate culpae puniatur.

Persons not in sacerdotal orders, who pretend to say Mass or hear sacramental confession, ipso facto incur the excommunication reserved speciali modo to the Apostolic See.

1 S. O., Dec. 2, 1874 (Coll. P. F., n. 1425).

2 Can. 1933, § 4; however, it may form a reason for suspension ex informata conscientia.

3 If avarice were the motive of

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A layman performing such acts must, besides, be deprived of any pensions and offices he may hold in the Church, and be punished with other penalties, according to the gravity of the crime; a cleric is to be deposed.

Benedict XIV, in his Constitution "Sacerdos in aeternum," mentions several papal documents (of Paul IV, Sixtus V, Clement VIII, and Urban VIII) which contain penalties decreed against such atrocious sacrileges. It is a usurpation of the highest power given to man, and is deservedly punished with great severity, not only with excommunication, but also with the delivery of the culprit to the secular arm, and degradation.[1] Our Code has modified the penalties according to the exigencies of the times.

1°. The persons intended here are all who have never been promoted to the order of the priesthood. Hence all laymen who are not of the clerical rank, as well as all clerics from the first tonsure to deaconship, inclusively.

The question may arise: How are we to prove that one is not of the priestly order? This, according to the aforesaid Constitution of Benedict XIV, may be settled by demanding of the incriminated person the testimonials of his ordination. For, according to our Code, can. 1010, §2, every cleric must be given a paper certifying the order he has received. Besides, the episcopal court must keep the records. Consequently, information, even in a private or confidential (i. e., extrajudicial way) may furnish the necessary proof for ordination required in our case. If no such written proof could be found, at least two witnesses would have to testify under oath to bination, or intemperance of breaking the fast, the circumstances would be serious.

1 Of these, Bened. XIV, "Quam grave," Aug. 2, 1757, treats in extenso.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the ordination or the fact that the defendant is a priest.[2]

3°. The acts here punished are two: pretending to say Mass and hearing sacramental confession.

a) Simulatio is an act by which one pretends to be what he is not. A Mass said by any person lacking the priestly power is no Mass at all,[3] no matter whether the person has the intention to say Mass or not. However, as Benedict XIV says, the sacrilegious act must have proceeded at least as far as the elevation of the host and chalice, or one of these acts inclusively. Whether or not the words of consecration were pronounced does not matter. Neither does it constitute a diminution of criminal imputability if Mass was said only once.

b) Hearing sacramental confession is also included in our canon. The text does not say: simulaverit; hence the mere act of hearing sacramental confession is sufficient to constitute the crime. What is a sacramental confession? It is the penitent's accusation of his sins made to a competent priest in order to obtain absolution. A confession made for the sake of obtaining consolation or counsel would not be sacramental, nor would it be sacramental if the penitent knew that the person to whom he made his confession lacked the priestly character.[4] But the formula of absolution need not be pronounced.[5]

2 Whether an invalidly ordained priest would incur this censure, is not quite certain; hence the benefit of doubt may at least be admitted in favor of non-incurrence.

3 See Lehmkuhl, l. c., II, n. 44: "fictum esse actum, qui externe ita ponatur, ac si omnia ad valorem requisita adsint, sed animo, seu sine interna voluntate et intentione." But here the intention is lacking objectively or fundamentally, not subjectively, at least not in recto.

4 Arregui, Summarium Theological Moralis, 1919, ed. 4, p. 367.

5 Bened. XIV, "Sacerdos in aeternum," § 8.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

4°. The penalties inflicted are: (a) excommunication latae sententiae reserved speciali modo to the Holy See. The phrase here is not accompanied by any extenuating or modifying word, such as praesumpserit, scienter, etc.; (b) all the other penalties are ferendae sententiae. This is also true of the punishments to be inflicted arbitrarily, i. e., proportionately to the seriousness of the criminal act, when persons who are not priests usurp the exercise of other priestly functions. Of this kind would be blessings reserved to priests if given by laymen.[6]

BLASPHEMY AND PERJURY

Can. 2323

Qui blasphemaverit vel periurium extra iudicium commiserit, prudenti Ordinarii arbitrio puniatur, maxime clericus.

Whoever blasphemes or commits perjury, outside of an ecclesiastical trial, may be punished according to the prudent judgment of the Ordinary, especially if the culprit is a cleric.

Two religious crimes, blasphemy and perjury, are here connected, because both are an offense against the immediate object of religion.

1. Blasphemy is defined as contumelious speech against God. It is heretical if His existence or His attributes are impugned or denied. It is simple if the contumelious utterance consists of mere imprecations. Blasphemous words may also be uttered against the Saints, because, as God is praised in his Saints, so also

[6] See can. 1147, § 3; 1342, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

may He be blasphemed in his Saints.[1] But it is controversial among theologians whether blasphemy, in the proper sense, can be committed by gestures, signs, or acts, for instance, spitting against heaven, treading on the crucifix, etc.[2]

a) Our text appears to include every species of contumelious utterance, whether by speech or gesture, provided the intention of blaspheming can be deduced from the act according to the common usage of the people and country.[3] An indication may be found in the expression "absque contumelia Creatoris," which doubtlessy includes gestures and acts.

b) The penalty is left to the Ordinary, who may decree a public penance or any other ecclesiastical penalty, provided, of course, the offense was an external and a public act.[4] For although it is not essential to the notion of crime that it be public, yet a public penance could not be imposed for an occult crime.

Heretical blasphemy belongs exclusively [5] to the ecclesiastical court. Simple blasphemy belongs to the mixed forum, i. e., the ecclesiastical as well as the secular courts may prosecute it. In England and in most of the United States blasphemy is still a statutory crime, but prosecutions for the offence have become very rare.[6]

2. Perjury is here understood as the contrary of an oath, and, therefore, a violation of truthfulness as well as a breach of a promise made under oath (see can.

1 C. 2, X, V, 26; Reiffenstuel, ib., n. 15.

2 C. 2 just quoted only mentions: linguam in blasphemiam relaxare; thus also S. Thom., II-II, q. 13, art. 2; Ballerini-Palmieri, l. c., II, n. 370.

3 Thus Hollweck, l. c., p. 193; Arregui, l. c., n. 202; Eichmann, l. c., p. 136; see also Rom. II, 14; I Tim. VI, 1; Tit. II, 5.

4 Cfr. can. 1933, § 1; can. 2312, § 2; for former penalties, see c. 2, X, V, 26; Pius V, "Cum primum," April 1, 1566, § 33.

5 Reiffenstuel, V, 26, n. 27.

6 Blackstone-Cooley, Commen-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1316 ff). There is no doubt that both kinds of perjury are here included and intended, provided only that the oath be extrajudicial, i. e., not taken with reference to an ecclesiastical trial.

Experts, witnesses, counsel, proxy, judges, who take the oath before or at the trial, therefore, are punishable in case of perjury according to can. 1743, §3; 1757, §2, n. 1; 1795, §2. Any other perjury, committed either by private persons or officials, except in reference to an ecclesiastical trial, is also punishable. If it occurs in a secular court, and the latter metes out a sufficient penalty, the ecclesiastical court may be satisfied.[7] The secular courts punish perjury if at least two trustworthy witnesses attest the falsity of the perjured statement.[8] This procedure may serve as a norm for Ordinaries in proceeding against perjurers. The penalty, being vindictive, requires some sort of judiciary trial.

Clerics should, of course, be tried in the ecclesiastical court and be punished more severely than laymen. Formerly penalties against laymen guilty of perjury were of varying severity. Thus a fast of forty days on bread and water, and seven years of ordinary penance, which meant at least two fast-days a week, were to be meted out according to a Pseudo-Fabian decree.[9] Clergymen were to be deposed, and in case of obstinacy, degraded.[10] These severe penalties show how the Church abhors this crime, which is not only an offense against religion, but undermines public trust and confidence.

taries, IV, 59; New International Encyclopedia, 1904, Vol. III, 163.

7 Can. 1933, § 3.

8 Kenny-Webb, Outlines of Criminal Law, p. 280 ff.

9 C. 18, C. 6, q. 1.

10 C. 7, Dist. 50; c. 9, C. 3, q. 5; c. 10, X, II, 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TRAFFICKING IN MASS STIPENDS AND DEFRAUDATION

Can. 2324

Qui deliquerint contra praescriptum can. 827, 828, 840, § 1, ab Ordinario pro gravitate culpae puniantur, non exclusa, si res ferat, suspensione aut beneficii vel officii ecclesiastici privatione, vel, si de laicis agatur, excommunicatione.

What canons 827, 828, 840, §1, forbid has been explained elsewhere,[1] and we have nothing to retract. We only add that (a) every species of trafficking in Mass stipends, (b) every curtailment of the number of Masses offered and accepted, (c) every fraudulent subtraction from the alms given for Masses when sending the intentions to others, is here included. The penalty is left to the judgment of the Ordinary, who shall take into consideration the seriousness of each case, especially the number and amount of stipends, the scandal given, and whether or not the culprit is a habitual offender. If the case is important and the transgressor is a clergyman, suspension or privation of benefice or ecclesiastical office would not be an exorbitant penalty. Hence the Ordinary could suspend the clergyman from both office and benefice. But the vindictive penalty of privation could only be either of benefice or of office, not of both together. Laymen who transgress these laws, e. g., booksellers and other merchants, can be punished by excommunication.

What we said elsewhere[2] concerning pious frauds we

1 See Vol. IV of this Commentary, p. 186 ff.

2 See Vol. VI of this Commentary, p. 614, note 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

here repeat, but with a restriction. If $100 are offered for Masses, without any further determination, 100 Masses must be said; neither would the priest satisfy his obligation if he said or sang twenty high Masses of his own accord. Only in case of a parish—this is our restriction—where the priest sings a Mass every day of the week and the donors know that the ordinary stipend for such a Mass is five dollars, might the priest be justified in saying only twenty Masses for $100.

SUPERSTITION AND SACRILEGE

Can. 2325

Qui superstitionem exercuerit vel sacrilegium perpetraverit, pro gravitate culpae ab Ordinario puniatur, salvis poenis iure statutis contra aliquos actus superstitiosos vel sacrilegia.

Whoever practices superstition or perpetrates a sacrilege, shall be punished by the Ordinary in proportion to the gravity of the offense. The penalties provided by law against certain superstitious acts and sacrileges are not touched by this canon.

1. Superstition is defined by St. Thomas [1] as an excess of religious worship or a vicious, ignorant, and abnormal form of belief and practice. Our canon considers not so much the speculative or purely mental excess as its practical expression, i. e., superstitious observance. This may be defined as an inadequate means to produce certain effects in a more or less preternatural way, generally by invoking the assistance of creatures or the powers of darkness. In the Decretals[2] a special title was devoted to this subject under the name of sortilegia. This is subsumed under divination or manifestation of secret and hidden things by means of signs and with the help of demons. A long list of various species, divided according to the signs or means employed, is given by the commentators: geomantia, if the earth was consulted, aeromantia, if the air; hydromantia, if water; pyromantia, if fire; haruspicium, if the entrails of animals; auspicium, if the flight of birds; augurium, if the twittering and chirping of birds; pedomantia, if the feet, and chiromantia, if the hands were inspected; omina, if the voices of men; onyrocritica, if dreams; physiognomia, if the whole body was inspected; spatulamantia if the spatula;[3] metoposcopia, if the forehead; pythonia, if the demon tells something through living men who are his tools; necromantia, if dead bodies are consulted; astrologia, if heavenly bodies are observed, not in a scientific, but superstitious way. We quote these names to show that the number of fools has not yet decreased. For all these forms of witchcraft, sorcery, magic, etc., are more or less practiced to-day by Spiritists. We may include here the use of the ouija board, unless it is handled for mere pastime—a most dangerous diversion.[4] Also certain medical practices which promise health to those who use certain signs or apply certain herbs in a specified way. As to hypnotism,

1 Summa Theol., II–II, q. 92, art. 1; S. C. P. F., Feb. 9, 1760 (Col n. 424).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2 Lib. V, tit. 21; see the commentators on the same, especially Reiffenstuel and Schmalzgrueber.

3 The term is not quite clear; "in spatula divinare" (Du Cange, Glossarium, VI, 632) seems to signify to divine from the shoulder or hips or brawn of a pig.

4 See the works of J. Godfrey Raupert: Modern Spiritism, The Dangers of Spiritualism, The New Black Magic (last chapter on the Ouija Board); J. Liljencrants, Spiritism and Religion; T. F. Coakley, Spiritism, the Modern Satanism; Lapponi-Gibbs, Hypnotism and Spiritism, 1915.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

it is not forbidden in itself, nor can it be styled a superstitious observance if practiced by scientific and conscientious physicians, and if no extraordinary effects are expected or promised. The penalty for these transgressions is arbitrary, but must be inflicted according to the rules laid down in can. 2223.

2. Sacrilege is a violation of sacred things, i. e., things destined for divine worship either by consecration or blessing (can. 1497, §2). It is personal, if a sacred person is violated externally;[5] local, if a sacred place is subjected to irreverence or scorn, such as suffices to desecrate a holy place (can. 1154); real, if sacred things are violated, such as the sacred species, consecrated utensils or images, etc.

3. All these sacrileges are here intended. The penalty is left to the Ordinary, though, as our canon says, the penalty for crimes specified in the Code remains intact, e. g.:

a) Personal sacrilege against clerics is procecuted by our Code in can. 2241, 2243, as far as the clerical privileges are concerned. The sacrilegium carnale is punished, especially as far as illicit or invalid marriage is concerned, in can. 2358, 2388.

b) Sacrilegium locale is especially punished in can. 2320, 2328, 2329. But the ius asyli is no longer[6] prosecuted by a special penalty, and therefore the first clause only of our canon takes effect;

c) Sacrilegium reale has special punishments assigned to it in can. 2320, 2345, 2346 (ecclesiastical property). The clause "salvis poenis," etc., means that the Ordinary should not inflict arbitrary punishment. He may, but 5 External action is required in order to constitute a crime; can. 2195, § 1.

6 "Apostolicae Sedis," n. 18; "Immunitatem asyli ecclesiastici, ausu temerario, violare iubentes aut violantes"; (exc. latae sent. R. P. reservata).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google is not bound to punish in cases where the law has not provided a special penalty.

TRADING IN FALSE RELICS

Can. 2326

Qui falsas reliquias conficit, aut scienter vendit, distribuit vel publicae fidelium venerationi exponit, ipso facto excommunicationem Ordinario reservatam contrahit.

Those who manufacture false relics or knowingly sell or distribute them or have them exposed to the public veneration of the faithful, ipso facto incur excommunication reserved to the Ordinary.

The preliminary questions as to the authenticity of relics have been explained under can. 1283-1285. No doubt the sad experiences made in Italy, especially since 1870, contributed to the making of this penal canon.

1. Manufacturers of relics are persons who make relics of common bones or other things pertaining to the Saints.[1] It does not matter whether these relics are direct (from the body) or indirect (from objects related to the Saints). It seems probable that, if part of a genuine relic were mixed with common things, there would be no manufacture of false relics in the sense of our canon, at least it would be doubtful and the benefit of doubt should be sustained.

2. Those who knowingly sell false relics are such as are fully aware that no authentic document exists or has ever existed. If can. 1285, §1 would have to be

1 Selling of true relics is forbidden as simony and sacrilege and to be punished according to can. 2325; but no excommunication is attached.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google applied, because of social disturbance, the relics could not be simply styled false; but in that case the local Ordinary should be consulted; excommunication, however, would not follow.

3. Those who distribute false relics knowingly, i. e., knowing that they are not genuine. It does not matter whether this is done by official or private persons. Thus a custos s. supellectilis may be as guilty as a simple-minded woman.

4. Those who knowingly expose or cause such false relics to be exposed may be the ecclesiastical or the civil authorities, who command such exposition. If an inferior, say a sexton or lay-brother, were ordered to expose them, his coöperation would have to be judged according to can. 2209. If he does not know the relics are false, he is entirely excused; but if he has doubts, he should try to make sure, though while in doubt he would escape excommunication, according to can. 2229, §2.

TRAFFICKING IN INDULGENCES

Can. 2327

Quaestum facientes ex indulgentiis plectuntur ipso facto excommunicatione Sedi Apostolicae simpliciter reservata.

Those who make profit from indulgences incur the ipso facto excommunication simply reserved to the Apostolic See.

The history of this canon runs back to the Reformation, but the traffic in indulgences and other spiritual favors is as old as the term simony. Pius V made special efforts to eradicate this evil,[1] and yet it lives on;

1 "Etsi Dominici," Feb. 8, 1567; "Quam plenum," Jan. 2, 1570,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

else the "Apostolicae Sedis" [2] and the Code would not have deemed it necessary to provide a special penalty for the modern followers of Simon Magus. The Code has considerably modified the former text; for, while the constitution of St. Pius V ("Quan plenum") and Pius IX included all kinds of spiritual favors, the Code strictly limits the penalties to indulgences.

The penalty provided in our canon is incurred by all who derive material profit from indulgences. Hence the mere announcement or promise of indulgences is sufficient, if money or other material profit, such as promotion, protection, aid, has been received and accepted. The essential thing is the simoniacal intention; whether the indulgence was really gained, does not matter. The mere fact that a questus (lucre, gain) was obtained by promulgating, preaching, or promising an indulgence, either papal or episcopal, is sufficient to establish the criminal fact.

It does not matter whether one does it himself or through another, or whether the purpose is good or bad, or the cause charitable.[3]

It was held before the promulgation of the Code that bishops do not incur this penalty.[4] This view must now be abandoned; for, according to can. 2227, §2, bishops are declared immune only from suspension and the interdict latae sententiae, but not from excommunication. Therefore, with the exception of Cardinals, all prelates may incur this censure. Neither is there any where other spiritual favors besides indulgences are mentioned.

2 II, 11: "Omnes qui quaestum facientes ex indulgentiis aliisque gratiis spiritualibus, excommunicationis censura plectuntur Constitutione S. Pii V. Quam plenum, 2. Januarii, 1569."

3 This is expressly stated in the aforesaid Constitution of Pius V.

4 Thus D'Annibale, l. c., p. 92, n. 137.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google reason why they should be exempt, since indulgences are granted or promulgated by prelates.

DESECRATION OF GRAVES AND CORPSES

Can. 2328

Qui cadavera vel sepulcra mortuorum ad furtum vel alium malum finem violaverit, interdicto personali puniatur, sit ipso facto infamis, et clericus praeterea deponatur.

Whosoever desecrates corpses or graves to commit theft, or from some other evil motive, is to be punished with the personal interdict, is ipso facto infamous, and if a cleric, should be deposed. The Christian religion as well as nature inculcate reverence for the dead and their resting places. The violation of a tomb was regarded as a crime under the Roman law and visited with the severest penalties. Those convicted of removing a body or digging up human bones were, if persons of the lowest rank, condemned to capital punishment; if of higher condition, they were banished to an island or condemned to work in the mines.[1] A chapter of the Decree of Gratian declares them infamous.[2] This penalty is here repeated and involves infamia iuris. The other two penalties, viz., the personal interdict, which may be inflicted on laymen and clerics, and deposition for clergymen, are ferendae sententiae.

No distinction is made between kinds of bodies or graves. Consequently, the body of a criminal is as sacred, in this respect, as that of a respectable citizen.

1 L. 11, Dig. 48, 12 de sepulchro violato; infamy stated in h 1, ibid.

2 C. 17, C. 6, q. 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Neither is it necessary that the grave be blessed. To violate it is a crime against a universal religious sentiment. The motive must be theft (for instance, to steal the appurtenances of a corpse, such as jewelry or precious metal) or some other wicked purpose, such as revenge, hatred, or superstition. While the keeping of bodies for anatomical purposes is legitimate,[3] stealing them, even though done for the sake of science, is an indictable offence [4] and falls under our canon.

DESECRATION OF CHURCHES AND CEMETERIES

Can. 2329

Ecclesiae vel coemeterii violatores, de quibus in can. 1172, 1207, interdicto ab ingressu ecclesiae aliisque congruis poenis ab Ordinario pro gravitate delicti puniantur.

Those who cause a church or cemetery to be desecrated or violated by acts described in canons 1172 and 1207, should be punished by the Ordinary with the interdict forbidding them to enter the church and with other penalties proportionate to the gravity of the crime.

The acts referred to are set forth in canons 1172 and 1207 and need no repetition. The penalty is ferendae sententiae, but stated preceptively, which means that the Ordinary is not entirely free to inflict it or not (can. 2223).

In connection with this canon and can. 2326, we may add that our Code is silent on an excommunication

3 Eichmann, l. c., p. 144.

4 Blackstone-Cooley, Comment., II, 429, note 7: "It being considered a practice contrary to common decency, and shocking to the general sentiments and feelings of mankind."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

latae sententiae simply reserved to the Holy See which was formerly imposed for carrying away relics from the catacombs of the City of Rome without the permission of the Cardinal Vicar.[1]

1 This penalty was mentioned in the "Apostolicae Sedis," II, § 15, but it has now a merely historical value. The curious reader is referred to the commentaries on said Constitution.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XIII

CRIMES AGAINST ECCLESIASTICAL AUTHORITIES, PERSONS AND THINGS

The term ecclesiastical comprehends whatever the Church makes use of by constitutional provision, either divine or human, and whatever she holds by legitimate titles. Constitution spells authority and therefore is here treated first (can. 2330-2340). Then comes the inviolability of clerical persons, including religious, or rather a specially privileged class of religious (can. 2341-3344), and, lastly, ecclesiastical property, which is safeguarded against unjust usurpation and incompetent administration (can. 2345-49).

TRANSGRESSIONS OF LAWS CONCERNING PAPAL ELECTION

Can. 2330

Quod attinet ad poenas statutas in delicta quae in eligendo Summo Pontifice committi possunt, unice standum const. Pii X Vacante Sede Apostolica, 25 Dec. 1904.

All laws touching papal election are abrogated except the Constitution of Pius X, "Vacante Sede Apostolica," Dec. 25, 1904, which remains in full force.[1] This Constitution also regulates the penalties decreed against offenders.

1 See the text in Card. Gasparri's (large) edition, pp. 685 ff., cap. VI. To this may be added "Commissum Nobis," Jan. 20, 1904, concerning

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

1. Those who commit simony[2] in the election of a Pope ipso facto incur excommunication, reserved to the future Pope, who shall declare the fact that the penalty has been incurred and who alone can absolve from this crime. However, the validity of the election can not be assailed on this score.

2. The same penalty is incurred by those, either cardinals, clerics, or laymen, who during the lifetime of the Pope and without his advice,[3] enter into negotiations with regard to the election of his successor, or promise to give their vote (with or without effect or counter promise) or dare to hold private meetings in order to deliberate and decide on the subject of the election.

3. The same penalty (excommunication) is incurred by cardinals, the secretary of the sacred college, and conclavists or others who in any way take part in the conclave, who under whatever pretext accept from any civil power the charge of proposing the so-called Veto or Exclusiva, even in form of a mere wish, or manifest it either to the S. College as a body or to single cardinals, whether in writing or orally, directly or indirectly, by insinuation or hints, or in any manner whatsoever, as long as the conclave lasts. This penalty extends to every kind of intervention or intercession or any form of interference that may come from any lay power of whatever rank or condition.

4. Cardinals who enter into ante-election agreements, or hold meetings or pledge themselves to give their vote to a certain person, henceforth incur the sentence of excommunication.

the Veto or ius exclusivae, and the Motu proprio "Cum proxime" of Pius XI (A. A. S., XIV, 6).

2 See can. 727.

3 Tractare means systematic negotiation with serious intent, not mere gossip or passing remarks.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

5. During the conclave the following transgressions are punished:

a) Cardinals who are not present at the balloting (scrutinium) after the bell has rung, incur the penalty of excommunication latae sententiae unless they are sick.[4]

b) Epistolary intercourse with the outside world is strictly forbidden during a conclave, more especially any communication through newspapers or magazines. The transgressors of this law incur excommunication latae sententiae. This penalty concerns not only the cardinals, but all conclavists.[5]

c) Every violation of the secrecy of the ballot is forbidden under the same penalty. This affects the cardinals only, and covers every communication, whether direct or indirect, that concerns the balloting or transactions of the congregation of cardinals, or the acts and decrees of the same, either before or during the conclave.[6]

DISOBEDIENCE AND CONSPIRACY

Can. 2331

§ 1. Qui Romano Pontifici vel proprio Ordinario aliquid legitime praecipienti vel prohibenti pertinaciter non obtemperant, congruis poenis, censuris non exclusis, pro gravitate culpae puniantur.

§ 2. Conspirantes vero contra auctoritatem Romani Pontificis eiusve Legati vel proprii Ordinarii aut contra eorum legitima mandata, itemque subditos ad inobedientiam erga ipsos provocantes, censuris aliisve poenis coerceantur; et dignitatibus, beneficiis aliisve muneribus, si sint clerici; voce activa et passiva atque officio, si religiosi, priventur.

4 "Vacante Sede," n. 37.
5 Ibid., n. 50.
6 Ibid., n. 52.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This canon regards two crimes which differ from each other not specifically, but in degree, namely disobedience and conspiracy.

1. Disobedience. Those who obstinately refuse to obey the Roman Pontiff or their own Ordinary, when these authorities legitimately command or forbid something are to be punished in proportion to the gravity of their guilt, censures not excluded.

a) Obedience presupposes the right to command and the obligation to obey. Hence there must be a tie or relation between superior and inferior. This is established either juridically or morally. In the juridical order the Roman Pontiff is the head and ordinary pastor of all the faithful, clergy and laity; the local Ordinary is the ecclesiastical governor of his territory and of those subject to him by reason of domicile or quasi-domicile. The superiors of exempt religious orders wield their power over those who are subject to them by reason of profession. In the moral order there are still other superiors, who govern their subjects by reason of the domestic power, but these are not considered in our canon.[1] For although the vow of obedience binds religious to their superiors, yet it is the moral power rather than the juridical (exercised in the external forum) that establishes the mutual relationship. But all religious, superiors and inferiors, are alike subject to the Roman Pontiff (can. 499, §1).

b) By Roman Pontiff there must be understood the supreme head of the Church as a religious and supernatural society. Consequently, disobedience to the Pope

1 The text says ordinarius, which must be understood according to can. 198, § 1, and can only be applied to superiors of exempt clerical institutes. Therefore, this canon does not concern non-exempt religious organizations with regard to their own superiors, but may concern them with regard to the local ordinary or prelate regular.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

as a temporal ruler is not included.[2] The supposition here is that the Pope is the legitimate occupant of St. Peter's chair.[3]

c) Ordinarius proprius, as stated above, means one who has subjects of his own. The clergy are especially obliged to exhibit reverence and obedience to their bishops (can. 127). The faithful living in the diocese are also obliged to obey the bishop, as their pastor. Exempt religious here are those subject to their own prelates or to the superiors of autonomous communities. To strange bishops and strange prelates or superiors the clergy and religious pay respect, but not obedience.[4]

d) Like a law, a precept, too, may be positive or prohibitive, according as it commands men to do or to omit something. The objective norm for all precepts is that what they order must be legitimate.

Legitimacy is measured, not by personal qualities or powers, but by the object of the precept. Since, however, every law is a participation in the eternal law, and every exercise of human power is therefore confined within the limits of that law, it follows that even the papal power has certain boundaries:

α) The Pope can command nothing that runs counter to the natural and divine law, though he may interpret or determine it. But he is not bound by the common law of the Church, although it is commonly presumed that he will order nothing that would exceed his power.

β) Ordinaries, including exempt religious superiors, cannot command anything that would clash with the common law. Neither are they allowed to command beyond what is established by particular law; at least, they are supposed to keep within proper limits.[5] Re-

2 D'Annibale, l. c., p. 33, n. 44.
3 Hollweck, l. c., p. 196.
4 C. 11, C. 11, q. 3.
5 Politics do not fall under the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google ligious superiors are not allowed to command anything against the common law of the Church, and a religious would not act disobediently if he refused to obey a command contained neither in the rule nor in the Constitutions of his order.

γ) Disobedience must be obstinate, which presupposes knowledge and free will, and, besides, a warning, according to can. 2307 or 2143; for obstinacy must be proven.

δ) The penalty is arbitrary, pro gravitate culpae, and ferendae sententiae.

2. A conspiracy is an agreement by two or more persons to effect an unlawful object, whether as the ultimate aim or only as a means to the same.[6] The aim of conspiracies as a rule is twofold: subversion of the ecclesiastical authority and incitement to rebellion against it.

a) This canon is aimed at those who enter into a conspiracy against the authority of the Roman Pontiff, or his legate, or their own Ordinary, or against the lawful commands of these authorities, as far as their power reaches, either legislative, or judiciary, or coercive, and as far as these authorities keep within the limits of their power. For such conduct is subversive of the hierarchic order and spells resistance to God.

Personal invectives, libelous writings, and defamation of the person as such, do not constitute a conspiracy. If a cathedral or religious chapter proposes amendments to its statutes or constitutions, this is not conspiracy. The Gravamina Nationis Teutonicae[7] were not considered a conspiracy, although they very closely resembled one. But if the threefold power named above is attacked by mutual agreement, and resisted, there is a conspiracy.

list of objects to which the power of the ordinary extends. Neither can superiors forbid their subjects to have recourse to the Holy See.

6 Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 273.

7 See Funk, Manual of Church History, II, 88, 165.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

b) Provoking or inciting subjects to disobey the aforesaid authorities also constitutes the crime here mentioned. But those who provoke or incite others to disobedience may be single individuals, agreement or conspiracy not being required. How far guilt may be imputed to them is to be determined according to can. 2209.

c) The penalty for conspiracy and incitement to disobedience is: the conspirators must be restrained by censures and other penalties; clerics must be deprived of their dignities, benefices, and other charges; religious must be deprived of the active and passive voice, and of their offices. Formerly clerics guilty of this crime were deposed and delivered to the curia.[8]

APPEAL TO A GENERAL COUNCIL

Can. 2332

Omnes et singuli cuiuscunque status, gradus seu conditionis etiam regalis, episcopalis vel cardinalitiae fuerint, a legibus, decretis, mandatis Romani Pontificis pro tempore exsistentis ad Universale Concilium appellantes, sunt suspecti de haeresi et ipso facto contrahunt excommunicationem Sedi Apostolicae speciali modo reservatam; Universitates vero, Collegia, Capitula aliaeve personae morales, quocunque nomine nuncupentur, interdictum speciali modo Sedi Apostolicae pariter reservatum incurrunt.

The theory that a general council is above the Pope now appears absurd. It was called ridiculous by Pius

8 Cfr. c. 18, C. 11, q. 3; a horrible imprecation is contained in c. 14, C. 11, q. 3 (Pseudo-Anterus): "inobediens spirituali animadversione truncatur, et eiectus ab Ecclesia rabido daemonum ore discerpitur."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

II [1] — not by Aeneas Silvius Piccolomini —, but in those sad times of schism even well-meaning men like Gerson looked upon it as the only anchor available on a troubled sea. To-day, of course, the error is neither excusable nor intelligible. It was proscribed several times [2] and our Code fixes its penalty.

1. The persons who incur the penalty here stated are:

a) Single individuals, of whatever state (lay or clerical), rank or condition, even royal persons, bishops, and cardinals.

b) Corporations, such as universities (also faculties), colleges, chapters, and other artificial persons, no matter what their name (congress, senate, parliament).

2. It makes no difference whether the general council appealed to, is in session, or to be held in future.[3] For appeal means recourse to a higher instance, and the fundamental error involved here is that there exists a higher tribunal than the Pope, and the injury is therefore committed against the supreme judge.

3. The appeal must be made from laws, decrees, or ordinances issued by a Pope actually governing the Church. The text includes laws, which the "Apostolica Sedes" had omitted: therefore all laws, also privileges and favors, decrees, either dogmatical or disciplinary, ordinances, for instance, provisions or appointments, or judiciary sentences in particular cases, provided these have emanated from the Roman Pontiff, as such, not as

1 "Execrabiltis," Jan. 18, 1459.

2 Julius II, "Suscepti regiminis," July 1, 1509; Bened. XIV, "Altissimo," June 26, 1745, § 1; "Apostolicae Sedis," § 1, n. 4:

"Omnes et singulos, cuiuscumque status, gradus seu conditionis fuerint, ab ordinationibus seu mandatis Romanorum Pontificum pro tempore existentium ad universale futurum Concilium appellantes, nec non eos, quorum auxilio, consilio vel favore appellatum fuerit." Conc. Vatic., IV, 3.

3 Since the text of the "Apostolicae Sedis" had "future," a council held hic et nunc seemed to be excluded; Pennacchi I, 412.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

a temporal ruler [4] or an international judge. The canon does not include decisions or ordinances issued by the S. Congregations and Tribunals.

Some [5] have raised a difficulty concerning an appeal from a law, decree, or ordinance of a Pope who has died after having issued said law, etc., and therefore seems not to exist any more. However, this is a rather subtle interpretation and certainly nullifies the intention of the lawgiver. Besides, it entails the absurdity that after the death of a Pontiff his laws, decrees, and ordinances could be appealed. Finally, such laws, etc., are intended not only for the lifetime of the Pope. Most probably the phrase "pro tempore exsistentis" was inserted in view of a possible resignation. An appeal from laws, decrees, or ordinances already abrogated would be senseless.

4. The penalties are:

For the individuals mentioned in the first clause (1, a), excommunication incurred ipso facto and reserved speciali modo to the Apostolic See; besides, suspicion of heresy.

b) For corporations, as such, mentioned in the second clause (1, b), the interdict ipso facto, reserved to the Apostolic See. Single members of the corporation, however, do not incur this censure.[6] If they are partakers or accomplices, they, as individuals, incur excommunication, but not the interdict.[7] Thus the members of a parliament or senate may vote against appeal to a council, and in that case they would not incur the penalty, even though the minority had appealed in their name; the single members

4 D'Annibale, l. c., p. 34, n. 47.
5 Pennacchi l. c., I, 409 f.
6 Thus Hollweck, l. c., p. 197, note 8; Eichmann, l. c., p. 150.
7 See can. 2209; can. 2219: a more benign interpretation.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google would be excommunicated, not interdicted, nor would the whole body be interdicted.

CIVIL INTERFERENCE WITH PAPAL COMMUNICATIONS (PLACET)

Can. 2333

Recurrentes ad laicam potestatem ad impediendas litteras vel acta quaelibet a Sede Apostolica vel ab eiusdem Legatis profecta, eorumve promulgationem vel exsecutionem directe vel indirecte prohibentes, aut eorum causa sive eos ad quos pertinent litterae vel acta sive alios laedentes vel perterrefacientes, ipso facto subiaceant excommunicationi Sedi Apostolicae speciali modo reservatae.

The kings of England and France in the XIIth century, constitutional monarchies and free republics alike were afraid and jealous of the papal power and endeavored to blockade its influence by submitting documents emanating from the Roman Curia to their personal inspection and approbation.[1] This is called the royal placet, although the text here has a somewhat wider meaning.

Three kinds of offenders incur the penalty here named: those who recur in order to impede, those who prohibit, and those who by word or deed terrify others.

1. The recurrentes are those who seek or ask the

1 Paschal II (1099-1118) already complained against the King of England that he would admit neither papal nuncios nor letters without his royal placet; see E. Friedberg, Die Grenzen zwischen Staat und Kirche, Tübingen, 1872, p. 729. Friedberg is strong in denouncing "papal absolutism," yet he does not defend the retention or introduction of the placet, because it does not fit in with the modern State (Rechtsstaat) and renders clashes with the Church more frequent; ib., p. 799 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

service and aid of others. The mode of recourse is not determined. It may be formal or informal, i. e., by appeal in civil law or by a mere petition.[2] All Catholics, whether laymen or ecclesiastics, are here included, excepting the Cardinals (can. 2227, §2).

The terminus ad quem of the recursus is the lay or civil power (laica potestas). This term supposes real power, as wielded in our country by the president, governors, congress, and judges.[3]

The terminus a quo is recourse calculated "to impede letters and documents (acta) coming from the Apostolic See or from its legates."[4] Apostolic letters are bulls, briefs, or motu proprios, or letters of recommendation, such as we often read in the Acta Apostolicae Sedis. Acta are decisions, decrees, admonitions, summonses, or any kind of rescripts issued either by the Pope himself or by the Roman Court,[5] according to can. 7.

Impedire means to impede or prevent some one from doing or obtaining something. The term implies that the one thus impeded is unwilling to bear the obstacle.[6] Since this word is connected with Apostolic letters, etc., which are already issued (profecta), it can only refer to the reception or transmission of such.

2. The prohibentes are not clearly determined, and the term itself is somewhat ambiguous. For prohibere in Latin may mean to prevent or impede as well as to prohibit or forbid. It appears to us that Pennacchi[7] has stated the correct meaning when he says that the act of

2 D'Annibale, l. c., p. 42, n. 61; Hollweck, l. c., p. 198.

3 Hollweck, ibid.

4 By legates are understood nuntii, internuntii, delegati apostolici, as the title of ch. V, tit. VI, book II, indicates; see can. 265-267.

5 S. O., Jan. 13, 1892 (Coll. P. F., n. 1777).

6 D'Annibale, l. c., p. 41, n. 60.

7 Comment., I, 285 f.; also D'Annibale, p. 49, n. 74.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

prohibition must proceed from some one in power. The prohibition of promulgating and executing papal documents may be direct or indirect. It is direct, if the competent magistrate forbids divulgation of such documents by a formal law, decree, bill, or sentence. It is indirect, if effective means are employed to hinder the promulgation or execution in a round-about way, for instance, by forbidding a courier to enter a city or town, or by commanding a postmaster not to transmit or deliver a papal document.

Promulgation may here be taken in the juridical sense, i. e., the making known of a papal letter in the usual form, which is now by insertion in the Acta Apostolicae Sedis. However, this interpretation appears to us improbable, since in that case only the Vatican Printing Office, or, at most, the Roman civil authorities would be concerned. Therefore we believe that promulgation here has the meaning of divulgation or making known. The Vatican Press, where the Acta Apostolicae Sedis are printed, is extra-territorial and the Italian government is supposed to respect the Law of Guarantees.

Execution means carrying into effect, and must be more particulary referred to the Acta of the Apostolic See. Here the "placet" might enter; for it means inspection and approval of a papal document by the civil government before it may be published and carried into effect. It is called "exequatur" if it concerns appointments. Of course, where both placet and exequatur are ratified by concordats, the penalty is not incurred.[8]

3. Those who, on account of papal letters or documents, injure or intimidate persons concerned in these documents, or other persons, are called laedentes. The 8 D'Annibale, l. c., n. 73.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google injury must be real, not merely verbal, and the insults serious, e. g., beating.

The perterrefacientes are those who grievously and seriously scare the interested persons into disobedience. The fear must be such as would influence a man of strong character.[9] The persons concerned are those for whom the documents are intended,— bishops, clerics, laymen, as well as others who are concerned with the publication and execution of the same.[10]

4. The penalty provided for such offenders against papal, i. e., sovereign authority, is excommunication reserved speciali modo to the Apostolic See and incurred ipso facto. The question is: When is the fact verified so that excommunication is incurred?

As to the recurrentes, D'Annibale[11] says, the excommunication is not incurred by them unless the lay or civil power has published a bill impeding the publication or execution of papal documents, because a recourse is an attempt and must be judged as such. This is according to our Code, can. 2212-2213.

As to the prohibentes, the same author says that the controversy among canonists exempts them from incurring the penalty, in case of a doubt of law or fact, because the benefit of doubt is always favorable to the defendant or guilty.[12]

As to laedentes and perterrefacientes, their guilt depends on the fact; if the injury is done or the fear ex-

9 Ibid.; thus threats of damage or defamation may scare a normally firm person.

10 Ibid.

11 L. c., p. 50, n. 74.

12 The prohibentes, therefore, would not incur the censure if the effect did not follow (effectu non secuto). Lehmkuhl, on the other hand, says: "Recursus sufficit, etsi recurrens passus sit repulsam" (II, 933). Hollweck (l. c., p. 198) distinguishes: If the recourse was rejected a limine, the penalty is not incurred; but if the motion is made and seconded, though it does not carry, the effect is verified and therefore the penalty is incurred.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google ercised, with the intent mentioned, viz.: to forbid the promulgation or execution of papal documents, this suffices to incur the penalty, no matter whether the effect intended did or did not follow. Neither is there any contradiction involved here, for the three classes are quite distinct from one another.

VIOLATION OF THE LIBERTY AND RIGHTS OF THE CHURCH

Can. 2334

Excommunicatione latae sententiae speciali modo Sedi Apostolicae reservata plectuntur:

1°. Qui leges, mandata, vel decreta contra libertatem aut iura Ecclesiae edunt;

2°. Qui impediunt directe vel indirecte exercitium iurisdictionis ecclesiasticae sive interni sive externi fori, ad hoc recurrentes ad quamlibet laicalem potestatem.

This canon comprises two rather inadequately distinguished violations of ecclesiastical liberty and rights. The one is a positive violation of any kind of rights, comprising the whole range of ecclesiastical liberty explained below. The other is a specific kind of violation, viz.: of jurisdiction (appellatio ab abusu).[1]

1 The appel comme d'abus cannot be clearly traced historically; but the fact is that, after the Pragmatic Sanction of 1438, it became a juridical institute of the French Parliament and appeared in the Gallican Articles (1682) as well as in the Organic Articles of Napoleon (1802); see Friedberg, l. c., p. 486 ff. England, too, had its Praemunire, the statutes of which were framed by Edward I (1272-1307) and sharpened by Richard II (1377-1399); see Blackstone-Cooley, Comm., IV, 103 ff. On the Writs of Prohibition, which are similar to the appellatio ab abusu, see Blackstone, III, 113; Friedberg, l. c., 738 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1. Those who issue laws, ordinances or decrees against the liberty and rights of the Church incur excommunication latae sententiae reserved speciali modo to the Apostolic See.

a) Edere means to pass a law; in this country any bill that passes both houses of Congress and is not vetoed by the President, is a law. An ordinance (mandatum) is an order issued by a particular court or magistrate, especially for the arrest or capture of a criminal; also a summons, warning, or injunction. A decree may be taken as a decision issued by a court, for instance, a supreme or district court, also a municipal ordinance either commanding or forbidding something. However, these decrees and ordinances must have a general character, and not refer merely to a particular case,[2] unless this should form a precedent.

All those, then, who coöperate in issuing or effectively enacting laws and decrees detrimental to the Church, must be considered guilty of the crime here denounced. But, in parliamentary language, several acts are required to make a law: the bringing in of a bill, seconding the motion, voting on it, passing it through the house or houses and, finally, signing or vetoing it. Are all these equally guilty? The answer is that, if the bill becomes a law, all are guilty who have in any effective way contributed to this end.[3]

Concerning decrees and ordinances, all those are guilty who shape and issue them, but not minor officials who

2 D'Annibale, l. c., p. 46, n. 68. Read, for instance, St. 16, Ric. 2, c. 5: "If any one shall purchase or pursue in the court of Rome or elsewhere, any translations of prelates, processes, sentences of excommunication, bulls, instruments, or any other things whatsoever against the King, his crown, his dignity, or his realm . . . he shall be put out of the King's protection and his lands and goods forfeited to the King," etc.

3 Hollweck, l. c., p. 206; D'Annibale, l. c., p. 46, n. 68.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google merely write or typewrite, print or publish the text, or sheriff or marshals who serve it.

b) The liberty and rights of the Church must be curtailed or set at naught in these laws, ordinances or decrees. The Church here is the universal Church, as such, although, as one distinguished commentator truly says,[4] it may happen that the whole Church is affected if a particular church is injured, for instance, by forbidding certain religious to exist in a certain province or diocese, or prohibiting processions and missions in a country. The liberty of the Church means her right to exist and to spread according to her nature and constitution (can. 100). Violations of this liberty are enumerated in can. 2333, 2334, 2336. Of course, there can hardly be serious talk about liberty where the native and independent rights of the Church are either entirely taken away or curtailed. Native rights are the right to preach the Gospel, can., 1322; to educate and train the clergy, can. 1352; to found and maintain her own schools, can. 1375; to possess her own cemeteries and property, can. 1206 and can. 1495; to enjoy the judiciary and coercive power, canons 1553 and 2214. These are essential rights. Acquired rights, if not directly connected with these native rights, are necessary only ad melius esse.

2. Those who, in order to impede the exercise of ecclesiastical jurisdiction in the internal as well as external forum, either directly or indirectly have recourse to any secular (lay) power, incur excommunication latae sententiae reserved modo speciali to the Apostolic See.

As is evident from the text, there is but one leading thought in it; or, in other words, one compound sentence,

4 Hollweck, l. c., p. 206, § 137, note 1.

5 Hollweck, l. c., p. 207.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

not two, as in the "Apostolicae Sedis."[6] Dissecting this one statement the following salient points may be distinguished.

a) The leading subject is "recourse to any lay power." What recourse means has been explained above: it is to seek help, or redress, or protection against real or imaginary wrongs. However, the recourse must produce an effect, viz., the act of impeding. If, therefore, the secular power refuses to entertain the recourse, the penalty is not incurred. But if the lay power would issue an injunction, even though it remained without effect, the penalty would follow.[7]

The term quaelibet laicalis potestas is wider here than in can. 2333, and may signify not only public, but also private power,[8] in as far as this really has power in the juridical sense, be it legislative, judiciary, executive or administrative. Whether this includes the domestic power, such as a father has over his children, a husband over his wife, seems doubtful; all the more so since the appellatio ab abusu, which is here intended, was addressed to the magistrates. Yet even private power may really impede the exercise of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, especially in the internal forum, and whenever it does so, it is undoubtedly included.

b) The subject or aim of such recourse must be to impede the exercise of ecclesiastical jurisdiction. The power of jurisdiction extends over all acts that emanate from, or presuppose, this government, as far as

6 § I. "6. Impedientes directe vel indirecte exercitium iurisdictionis ecclesiasticae sive interni, sive externi fori, et ad hoc recurrentes ad forum saeculare eiusque mandata procurantes, edentes, aut auxilium, consilium vel favorem praestantes."

7 Hollweck, l. c., p. 200, note 10.

8 See c. 4, 6°, III, 27; however, what we state in the text may be doubtful, although D'Annibale (l. c., p. 42, n. 60) sets it forth as sententia communior.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

they are distinguished from the power of order. All acts of order, strictly speaking, are therefore to be eliminated from this text, such as the celebration of Mass, the holding of religious services, saying public prayers; in fact, we believe, all acts of divine office. Our canon refers only to acts of jurisdiction, though these may, of course, presuppose the power of order. It does not matter whether the jurisdiction is ordinary or delegated, of the internal or the external forum, sacramental or non-sacramental, exercised criminally or civilly, or by way of administration, such as appointment to, or removal from, offices or benefices.

To impede means to cause one to quit working against his will. An obstacle may be put in the way in the very beginning, or when the sentence is to be executed. Take, for instance, the case of the removal of a pastor under can. 2156. If the investigation is prevented in limine by lay interference, the procedure is nipped in the bud; whereas, if the sentence of removal has been given, and the pastor does not move nor leave his residence, the execution only is stopped.

An impediment may be placed in the way of a process either directly or indirectly. Direct interference is that used against one who is entitled to exercise jurisdiction, by either resisting or nullifying his acts. Indirect intervention is that used against the Ordinary or others who exercise jurisdiction by threatening or molesting their relatives, friends, dependents, agents, servants, in order to intimidate, prevent or stop the giving or carrying out of a sentence.[9]

c) The penalty for such interference is excommunication for laymen as well as clerics of every degree and rank, with the exception of cardinals (can. 2227, §2).

[9] D'Annibale, I. c., p. 41 f.; n. 60.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Clerics and religious who transgress the penal laws of can. 2334 and 2335 are, besides, subject to the following penalties.

Can. 2336

§ 1. Clerici qui delictum commiserunt de quo in can. 2334, 2335, praeter poenas citatis canonibus statutas, poena suspensionis vel privationis ipsius beneficii, officii, dignitatis, pensionis aut muneris, si qua forte in Ecclesia habeant; religiosi autem privatione officii et vocis activae ac passivae aliisque poenis ad normam constitutionum plectantur.

§ 2, see infra, p. 346.

This penalty is ferendae sententiae, but does not supersede or supplant the excommunication stated in can. 2334. Those who inflict it, are obliged to do so according to can. 2223, and there is no choice except between general suspension and privation of benefice, office, dignity, pension, or any position the culprits may hold in the Church. Religious must be deprived of their office and of the active and passive vote; they should also be punished according to the penal rules of their own constitutions.

FREEMASONRY

Can. 2335

Nomen dantes sectae massonicae aliisve eiusdem generis associationibus quae contra Ecclesiam vel legitimas civiles potestates machinantur, contrahunt ipso facto excommunicationem Sedi Apostolicae simpliciter reservatam.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Those who enlist in Masonic sects or other associations of the same kind, which plot against the Church or against lawful civil authority, ipso facto incur the excommunication simply reserved to the Apostolic See.

The text distinguishes two kinds of pernicious societies, although both have the same purpose, and the purpose alone is sufficient to merit the penalties decreed in the text.

1. Freemasons are here understood as a sect with compact organization and set rules or constitutions. Their origin, to judge from their own writings, seems to be rather obscure, but is generally assigned to the year 1717. England is the birthplace of Freemasonry.[1] There is no doubt that secrecy is the essence of this institution, that symbols and allegories which are traced to the beginning of religion are conspicuous in the genuine sect of Freemasons. It is also admitted that their outspoken advocacy of a sort of freedom which brooks no law except the ego has prompted civil governments to forbid them long [2] before Clement XII issued his Constitution "In eminenti," April 28, 1738, which Benedict XIV ratified and renewed in "Providas," March 18, 1751, and other papal constitutions and decrees repeated or modified, as will be seen in the course of these comments.

By Masonic sects were understood societies whose members were bound by an oath to keep everything secret, and who had their own ritual as well as organization. Their aim was clearly characterized by their underground activities. However, though the first papal constitutions, up to the time of Pius IX, stress secrecy,

1 A. Preuss, A Study in American Freemasonry, 1908, pp. 346 ff.

2 Thus its lodges were proscribed in 1735 by an edict of the States of Holland, and Louis XIV forbade them in France, 1737; Preuss, l. c., p. 372.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

we find a departure from this "essential" element of Masonry in 1846. For a decree of the Holy Office, Aug. 5, 1846, reads thus: When secret societies are spoken of in the papal constitutions, all those are to be understood which pursue a special aim against the Church or government, no matter whether or not they demand an oath of secrecy.[3] Henceforth this practice was adhered to by the Roman court, as later decisions prove. Consequently, the dependent clause in our text which begins with "quae contra Ecclesiam —" must be referred to Masonic sects, as a distinctive note. It is implied that every Masonic sect has this aim in view. But this is a mere presumption, which can be overthrown by facts. And the facts can be ascertained only by an inspection of the resp. constitutions and by-laws; for the ritual alone would barely give a satisfactory answer. This we thought necessary to state in order to avoid confusion. It goes without saying that the "Grand Lodges" of America, the English Lodges of the York and Scottish Rite, as well as the Grand Orient and Supreme Council of France and Italy and elsewhere[4] belong not only to the Masonic sect, as here intended, but are condemned sects. For there can be little doubt that they aim at subverting Church and State. The nations involved in the world war need have no doubts as to this sad and well-established fact.

2. Which are the other associations of the same kind mentioned in our text? Note the word association, which is different from sect, the term employed in the "Apostolicae Sedis."[5] Association admits of a wider

3 Coll. P. F., n. 1350, note 2.
4 Preuss, l. c., p. 378 ff.
5 § II. 4. "Nomen dantes sectae Massonicae, aut Carbonariae, aut aliis eiusdem generis sectis, quae contra Ecclesiam vel legitimas potestates seu palam, seu clandestine machinantur, nec non iisdem sectis favorem qualemcumque praestantes;

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google range. It does not necessarily mean a "closed" or compact society, with statutes or by-laws, but merely a union of individuals for a definite purpose. From this viewpoint l'Internationale, Communists, Nihilists, Bolshevists, etc., may be included in the term.

3. The aim or end of these societies must be, as the text says, "plotting either against the Church or the legitimate civil power." Therefore, if by a happy inconsistency any Masonic sect would reverse this aim, it would not incur the penalty provided by this canon.

a) Machinari signifies to contrive, but is generally used in the bad sense of plotting or contriving with an evil design, scheming maliciously, as we say in the impediment of crime: uno machinante. Here it means any written, oral or actual agitation or concerted propaganda and incitement against Church or State.[6] However, it must be understood that such plotting must be the aim of the society or association as such, not merely of individual members. For no society can be held responsible for acts which single members perform as private citizens. Therefore, the constitutions or statutes or by-laws or a secret oath or simple promise must bind — not oblige, for no obligation can arise from illicit promises — the members to pursue that aim.

b) The plotting must be directed either against the Church or against the lawful civil authority,— one of them being sufficient.

The Church is plotted against if the whole Church, not merely particular parts of it, is attacked in her dogmas and disciplinary or administrative laws, in her hierarchy and ministers.[7] One plots against the lawful civil power earumque occultos coryphaeos ac duces non denunciantes, donec non denunciaverint."

6 Hollweck, l. c., p. 171, note 7.

7 Leo XII, "Quo graviora," March 13, 1825. For instance, the book of

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

by stirring up the people and overthrowing the legitimate government, as was the case in Portugal of late. The question when a government is lawful, may cause some trouble to the international, national, and individual conscience. The international and national consciences — if there is such a thing — are closely interwoven.

Broadly speaking, a government must be held legitimate if it is recognized by other nations, either formally by an act of declaration, or informally by establishing or re-establishing diplomatic relations.[8] But the individual conscience cannot be settled by a "League of Nations" or by diplomatic relations or commercial treaties. Take, for instance, the case of the Portuguese or the French Royalists, or the Castilian-Catalonian pretensions, not to speak of the former Papal States.[9]

4. Which sects or associations are intended by our canon?

a) There can be no doubt that the Masonic lodges, as they originated in England and were transplanted to the U. S., in 1729, i. e., the "Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite" as well as the "Grand Orient of France," have all the earmarks of a sect, as here intended. And by the way it may be stated that Orientals also, (Ruthenians, Greeks, Armenians, Syrians, etc.), who belong to such a sect incur the censure here mentioned.[10]

b) What about the "Independent Order of Good Templars"? If it is true that this society is closely allied with the Freemasons, nay even presupposes Masonry of a high degree,[11] there can be no doubt that

J. D. Buck. The Genius of Freemasonry, 1907 (Preuss, l. c., p. 423 ff).

8 See Westlake, International Law, 1910, Part I: Peace, pp. 50 ff.

9 In such cases the benefit of doubt should be accorded, and therefore the censure is not incurred.

10 S. O., Aug. 6, 1885 (Coll. P. F., n. 1640).

11 See Preuss, l. c., p. 421, note.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

it is included in the name of Masonic sects, provided its aim is plotting against Church and State. It may be added that the Holy Office,[12] although severely forbidding them, has not declared the Good Templars liable to the excommunication pronounced in the "Apostolicae Sedis."

c) The same is true with regard to the "Odd Fellows," the "Sons of Temperance" and the "Knights of Pythias."[13] But although these four lodges are not formally condemned, and therefore do not constitute "condemned sects," yet if they either secretly or openly pursue a subversive aim, as defined in our canon, they certainly incur censure.

d) To the associations with a pernicious aim of plotting must now[14] be reckoned the Nihilists, the Communists, the radical Socialists, and others of the same kind.

e) The Fenians of Ireland and England were especially singled out as falling under the censure.[15]

5. The last-named sect gave rise to several questions concerning absolution. The bishops were advised as follows:

a) They should gravely enjoin on confessors the duty of admonishing the penitents not to enroll in secret societies, nor to frequent the meetings of these societies, nor to favor them in any way.

b) The confessors should refuse absolution to the obstinate (pertinacibus), i. e., those who insist on remaining members of the secret society in question.

12 S. O., Aug. 9, 1893 (Coll. P. F., n. 1845): "Dilata" but the answer never came.

13 S. O., Aug. 20, 1894 (Putzer, Comment., ed. 4, p. 235).

14 D'Annibale, l. c., p. 79, n. 117 excludes: Old Catholics (of course!), Communists, Socialists, the so-called Internationale, Nihilists.

15 S. O., July 2, 1845; July 5, 1865; Jan. 12, 1870 (Coll., nn. 998, 1870), also cremation societies if affiliated with Freemasons; S. O., May 19, 1886, ed. 1 (ib., n. 1657).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

c) Those genuinely repentant should be absolved from the excommunication incurred.[16]

There are difficulties in demanding the eiuratio or abjuration of secret societies, on account of the serious temporal disadvantages often involved. The Bishop of St. Hyacinth petitioned the Holy Office in casu,[17] and received the following answer:

Repentant members of such societies may be admitted to the Sacraments if: 1°. they really withdraw from the secret societies in question; 2°. if they promise never to take part in any secret or public act and not to pay the dues or fees; 3°. if they repair the scandal given as well as they can; 4°. if they are really disposed to withdraw their name from the roster as soon as it can be done without serious loss.

d) A later decision of the Holy Office[18] again touched the question. The eiuratio, it says, may be performed before the confessor, no matter whether the fact of membership be notorious or not, provided the members of forbidden societies actually withdraw from membership, forswear and reject the sect at least in presence of the confessor, and repair the scandal they have given as well as they can.

Since the censure is one simply reserved, Ordinaries need a general faculty to absolve from it.[19] This may be imparted to confessors. But regulars cannot absolve from this censure in virtue of their privileges.[20]

Concerning occult cases, see can. 2237, §2, which permits Ordinaries to absolve from occult cases. This 16 S. O., Aug. 1, 1858 (Coll. P. F., n. 1116).

17 S. O., March 7, 1883 (ib., n. 1593); the decision of Jan. 19, 1896, is not inserted in this collection, probably on account of its very particular character.

18 S. O., Aug. 3, 1898 (Coll., n. 2014).

19 Can. 2253, n. 3.

20 S. Poenit., Dec. 5, 1873 (Coll. P. F., n. 1409).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

faculty may be communicated to others (see can. 199, §1). A case is occult as long as the name is not published or the membership publicly known, or known only to a few reticent persons. But those who frequent Masonic meetings, wear Masonic emblems, and show themselves as adepts in Masonry,[21] cannot be called secret Masons. Since the very fact that they have enrolled in such a sect is sufficient for incurring the censure, it may be that one would say: I did not know the true character of this society. He may be looked upon as penitent and may be really penitent. However, be it as it may in rare individual cases, such ignorance seems hardly possible after all the papal constitutions and warnings that have been published. On the other hand, since a general rule can hardly be stated, the benefit of doubt may be accorded to one who asserts that he was really ignorant and is now penitent.[22] Hence can. 209 and can. 2247, §3 may be applied.[23]

Can. 2336

For § 1 see supra, p. 339.

§ 2. Insuper clerici et religiosi nomen dantes sectae massonicae aliisque similibus associationibus denuntiari debent Sacrae Congregationi S. Officii.

Clerics and religious who join (nomen dantes) the Masonic sect and other similar associations must be denounced to the Holy Office. Consequently religious superiors are not allowed to meddle in such cases, because they concern matters of faith, according to can. 501, §2.

21 S. O., June 27, 1838 (ib., n. 868).

22 S. O., Aug. 1, 1855 (ib., n. 1116).

23 That can. 2254 may also be applied is evident.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

But they may denounce delinquents either to the local Ordinary or to the Holy Office directly, provided there is proof, not mere suspicion based on gossip. No canonical warning or judiciary hearing of witnesses is permitted.

INCITEMENT OF PRIESTS TO INSUBORDINATION

Can. 2337

§ 1. Si parochus, ad impediendum exercitium ecclesiasticae iurisdictionis, ausus fuerit turbas ciere, publicas pro se subscriptiones promovere, populum sermonibus aut scriptis excitare aliaque similia agere, pro gravitate culpae, secundum prudens Ordinarii iudicium, puniatur, non exclusa, si res ferat, suspensione.

§ 2. Eodem modo puniat Ordinarius sacerdotem qui multitudinem quoquo modo excitet ad impediendum ingressum in paroeciam sacerdotis legitime nominati in parochum aut oeconomum.

The proximate source of §1 of this canon is the decree "Maxima cura," of Aug. 20, 1910, which formerly regulated the administrative removal of pastors. The material source is nothing less than the documents which protested against the "appeal from abuses." There is a chapter in the Pseudo-Decretals which forbids under severe penalty the inciting of a congregation against its pastor and says the disturber should be punished like a revolutionary, i. e., "expelled from the whole people.[1]" The custom of appealing to the civil court became common in France and was imitated in other countries, as [1] C. 7, C. 11, q. 3 (Capitula Martini Brag., Migne, 130, 584).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

may be gathered from Innocent VIII's complaint.[2] The so-called Liberal clerics of the time of Pius IX followed the same tendency. It was but natural, therefore, that the "Maxima cura," which facilitated the removal of pastors, should contain a penal paragraph for such as would not obey the command of removal. Hence the wording of can. 18, §1 in the "Maxima cura" commences with "ad renunciationem et amotionem impediendam" and ends with "puniantur," — to which our canon adds: "non exclusa, si res ferat, suspensione."

A pastor who, in order to impede the exercise of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, dares to perpetrate the following or similar acts must be punished in proportion to the gravity of his guilt by the Ordinary according to his own prudent judgment, if necessary, even with suspension. The acts thus punishable are:

a) Exciting the people;

b) Promoting public subscriptions for himself, or

c) Rousing the people by sermons or writings, etc.

The intention must therefore be to place an obstacle in the way of the exercise of ecclesiastical jurisdiction. The text does not say that the exercise must be just. Of course, if jurisdiction has ceased, there can be no attack against it. Thus if a resigned or suspended[3] bishop should attempt to exercise jurisdiction, this canon would not apply. On the other hand, no matter how unjust the exercise or its motive may be, obedience is required. For to adjust matters in a revolutionary way is worse than the suffering of one innocent person. Besides, there are plenty of legal ways and means to get justice done, such as recourse, appeal, etc.

2 "Officii nostri," Jan. 25, 1491, § 2 (Bull. Luxemb., I, 449).

3 See can. 2284: after a declaratory or condemnatory sentence.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

"Ausus fuerit" supposes full knowledge and approval, according to can. 2229, §2. Therefore, if a pastor was mentally depressed, the penalty should not be meted out. Also, if others perpetrated the forbidden acts against his will. But if the others acted thus at his instigation or with his approval, either public or secret,[4] he would be liable to punishment.

The acts forbidden include all kinds of demagogic demonstrations. Worst of all is turbas ciere, for this means to set a large and promiscuous crowd into commotion. The penalty for this crime is arbitrary and ferendae sententiae. Suspension both from office and benefice may be applied in more serious cases unless the Ordinary limits it to one (can. 2279).

This section of canon 2337 is strictly limited to pastors, and to all who go by that name, either irremovable or removable, including quasi parochi, etc., according to can. 451, §2. The "Maxima cura" (can. 30) excepted oeconomi and temporary vicars, but the Code undoubtedly includes vicarii paroeciales, provided they have full parochial powers.[5]

§ 2 of can. 2337 establishes the penalty to be meted out by the Ordinary to offending priests. This is a wider term, including any priest of the secular clergy as well as of religious orders. Priests, then, who in any way stir up the populace to impede or prevent a fellow-priest who has been lawfully appointed as pastor or oeconomus from entering the parish, must be punished in like manner. Here the incitement to insubordination is described

4 Innocent VIII, "Officii nostri," § 2; Reg. Iuris 72 in 6°. Collecting "affidavits," as such, in order to prove one's innocence, is not, we believe, forbidden by this law; but if the affidavits would amount to a great number and be accompanied by a protest against removal, "promoting public subscriptions" would certainly be verified.

5 This seems to follow from § 2 of our canon.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google rather indefinitely (quoquo modo), without reference to the effect.

Ingressus means the taking possession of an office to which one has been appointed. If accompanied by ceremonies, it is sometimes called installation. But the appointment must have been lawfully (legitime) made. The legitimacy may be affected by the person who makes the appointment. Thus an appointment made by a Vicar-General without special commission from the Ordinary would be illegitimate (can. 152). A suspended or resigned bishop could not legitimately appoint a pastor or curate. Again, validity may suffer on account of the office not being vacant by law, concerning which see canons 150, §1, 151 and 183. The lack of a written document (can. 159) does not invalidate an appointment.

The penalty stated is the same as in §1. Hence it is arbitrary, but obligatory, in the sense of can. 2223. Suspension, either general or special, total or partial, may be inflicted.

Religious, too, may be thus punished, provided they be pastors or priests, according to can 616, §2.

DISREGARD OF RESERVATION AND OF PENALTIES

Can. 2338

§ 1. Absolvere praesumentes sine debita facultate ab excommunicatione latae sententiae specialissimo vel speciali modo Sedi Apostolicae reservata, incurrunt ipso facto in excommunicationem Sedi Apostolicae simpliciter reservatam.

§ 2. Impendentes quodvis auxilium vel favorem excommunicato vitando in delicto propter quod excommunicatus fuit; itemque clerici scienter et sponte in

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

divinis cum eodem communicantes et ipsum in divinis officiis recipientes, ipso facto incurrunt in excommunicationem Sedi Apostolicae simpliciter reservatam.

§ 3. Scienter celebrantes vel celebrari facientes divina in locis interdictis vel admittentes ad celebranda officia divina per censuram vetita clericos excommunicatos, interdictos, suspensos post sententiam declaratoriam vel condemnatoriam, interdictum ab ingressu ecclesiae ipso iure contrahunt, donec, arbitrio eius cuius sententiam contempserunt, congruenter satisfecerint.

§ 4. Qui causam dederunt interdicto locali aut interdicto in communitatem seu collegium, sunt ipso facto personaliter interdicti.

Three of these four sections repeat in a somewhat modified form parallel enactments of the Apostolicae Sedis."[1]

1. The first section punishes with excommunication ipso facto and simply reserved to the Apostolic See all who without the necessary faculty dare to absolve any one from excommunication latae sententiae, either most especially or especially reserved to the Apostolic See.

1 Absolvere autem praesumentes sine debita facultate, etiam quovis praetextu, excommunicationis vinculo Romano Pontifici reservatae innodatos se sciant, dummodo non agatur de mortis articulo, in quo tamen firma sit quoad absolutos obligatio standi mandatis Ecclesiae, si convaluerint.

§ II. 16. Communicantes cum excommunicato nominatim a Papa in crimine criminoso, ei scilicet impendendo auxilium vel favorem.

§ II. 17. Clericos scienter et sponte communicantes in divinis cum personis a Romano Pontifice nominatim excommunicatis et ipsos in officiis recipientes.

§ VI. 2. Suspensionem ab Ordine suscepto ipso iure incurrunt, qui eumdem ordinem recipere praesumpserunt ab excommunicato vel interdicto nominatim denunciatis, aut ab haeretico vel schismatico notorio: eum vero, qui bona fide a quopiam eorum est ordinatus, exercitium non habere ordinis sic suscepti, donec dispensetur, declaramus.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Here the phrase "quovis praetextu" is omitted, and instead of it there is inserted "sine debita facultate." This involves contempt or disregard of the papal authority,[2] which is entitled to limit the power of inferior prelates. Notice the word praesumentes and compare can. 2229, §2, also can. 2247, §3, concerning ignorance of reservation, except of censures specialissimo modo reserved to the Apostolic See. Of course the cases of necessity and death, mentioned in canons 2252 and 2254, are excepted from the penalty here stated.

2. The second section regards the communicatio cum vitandis and implies disregard for the coercive power, contempt of the common penal law, and coöperation in crime. The first clause of the paragraph concerns all, laymen as well as clerics, whilst the second is directed to clerics only.

a) Those who offer any aid to or favor an excommunicatus vitandus in the crime for which he was excommunicated, ipso facto incur the excommunication simply reserved to the Apostolic See. To lend a helping hand (auxilium impendere) properly means to assist in committing a crime,[3] but this cannot be the meaning here, as the crime is supposed to have been already committed. What is meant, therefore, is participation in a crime for which one was excommunicated, or, as it used to be called, in crimine criminoso. Furthermore, the help must be given to one who was nominally declared vitandus by the Apostolic See. Hence we are dealing with a clearly determined case,[4] and consequently, the aid here intended is confirmation in evil, assisting in publishing a defence of the crime denounced, or material

2 See c. 1, Clem. V, 7.

3 Cfr. cc. 3, 6, 17, C. 11, q. 3; c. 29, X, V, 39.

4 Such were the cases of Hubert Reinkens (1873) and Romolo Murri.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google support in order to enable the culprit to escape from the ecclesiastical court.

Favor is a somewhat wider term and includes any favor, either spiritual or temporal, by vote, recommendation, presence, also negatively, e. g., the omission of a denunciation to which one is in duty bound. In this sense also counsel or advice is included.[5] But all that is, as we said, strictly to be referred to the reason for which one was nominally declared vitandus. Hence mere social intercourse, as described in can. 2267, is not forbidden; nor would those otherwise not allowed to have intercourse with a vitandus incur the penalty here stated for this act, even though it were forbidden. Hence the excommunicatio minor is entirely obsolete.

b) The second clause of §2, can. 2338, punishes with the same excommunication incurred ipso facto and simpliciter reserved to the Apostolic See all clerics who knowingly and of their own accord communicate with a vitandus in divinis and receive him in divinis officiis.

This text is a modified reproduction of older sources.[6]

1°. By clerici are understood all clerics,[7] religious as well as secular, of every rank and dignity. There is no reason[8] whatever why prelates inferior to the Pope should not be included, except cardinals.

2°. The vitandus here mentioned must be a cleric, for mere participation in divinis is not sufficient to incur the penalty, but admission to the performance of divine office is required. Therefore, if the rector of a church

5 D'Annibale (l. c., n. 152) and Pennacchi (I, 1045, ff.) hold otherwise; yet D'Annibale (l. c.) says: "Excommunicato propter furtum persuadeat [sic!] ne restituat." This is called in Italian battibecchio — a hair-splitting, unfounded altercation about a word or phrase.

6 See c. 18, X, V, 39; "Apostolicae sedis" (quoted above).

7 Can. 2227, § 2.

8 Weak is the reasoning of Pennacchi I, 1053. What we say is upheld also by D'Annibale, p. 99, n. 152; Hollweck, l. c., p. 337 note 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

would administer holy communion to a clericus vitandus, or would bury him, or admit him to hear Mass, the penalty would not be incurred. But if he would admit him to say Mass, or to administer the Sacraments, he would be amenable.[9]

3°. The text clearly states admission to, and participation in, divinis officiis. This removes all doubt[10] as to the nature of the offices intended. They are the divine offices mentioned in can. 2256, n. 1. Consequently mere official acts, such as administrative or judiciary functions, are not included. Preaching, though an act emanating primarily from jurisdiction, presupposes the clerical character, and is therefore, at least indirectly, enumerated among the divine offices.[11] It follows that clerici vitandi should not be allowed to preach.

4°. The participation and admission here forbidden must be rendered knowingly and spontaneously (scienter et sponte). Therefore can. 2229, §2 must be consulted.

§ 3 of can. 2338 punishes disregard of the local interdict and of the ecclesiastical censures incurred by clerics. The wording of our text, which is based on ancient sources[12] and on the "Apostolicae Sedis," is less liable to misinterpretation than the older laws on the subject.

1. The local interdict (can. 2268 ff.) is first safeguarded. Those who knowingly celebrate or have others celebrate divine offices in interdicted places, ipso iure incur the interdict prohibiting them from entering any church until they have given due satisfaction to him whose sentence they have disregarded.

a) The persons to be understood here are clerics only, as all commentators maintain, because clerics alone are

9 D'Annibale, l. c.

10 Ib., note 8; Hollweck, l. c., p. 337, note 7.

11 Can. 2259, § 1.

12 See c. 7, C. 11, q. 3; c. 18, X, V, 39; c. 18, 6°, V, 11.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google supposed to be celebrants.[13] All clerics are included, also exempt religious.[14] Exception, of course, must be made in favor of bishops, but not of Ordinaries as such, in virtue of can. 2227, §2. Bishops therefore do not incur this penalty.

b) By officia divina are understood the offices named in can. 2256, n. 1.

c) The penalty is not incurred if ignorance can be pleaded, i. e., any kind of ignorance except affected.[15] Nor is the penalty incurred when the celebration and permission of the celebration occur in places, though interdicted, where celebration is allowed according to common law, as stated in can. 2270 f. On the other hand, it does not matter whether the local interdict was imposed by law, by the Apostolic See, or by the bishop.

d) Consequently, the judge as to whether the satisfaction is sufficient or not, is the authority who has pronounced the interdict; he may also absolve from this penalty.

2. Those who admit to the celebration of divine offices forbidden under censure such clerics as have sustained a declaratory or condemnatory sentence of excommunication, interdict or suspension, incur the same interdict from entry into the church, under the same condition of sufficient satisfaction.

a) The term admittentes includes all clerics, higher or lower, with the exception of bishops (can. 2227, §2). Prelates regular or their subjects, also chaplains, and custodians of clerical rank, are also included.[16]

b) Those admitted are clerics under censure. Hence

13 D'Annibale, l. c., p. 135, n. 218; see can. 1260.

14 C. 8, 6°, V, 7. Regulars caused trouble in regard to maintaining the interdict.

15 Can. 2229, § 2; but sponte must not be read into the text except as far as the canon quoted allows.

16 D'Annibale, l. c., p. 136, n. 220; Hollweck, l. c., p. 338, note 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

a vindictive penalty is excluded. Besides, the censure of either excommunication or (personal) interdict or suspension must have been either declared or incurred by a condemnatory sentence. On the other hand, it matters nothing whether this sentence was declared or issued in a condemnatory way by the Pope, or by the bishop, or by a religious superior.

c) Scienter must be connected with admittentes, and therefore can. 2229,,§2 is applicable. But light fear or compulsion would not be sufficient to escape the penalty.[17]

b) The penalty for both transgressions enumerated in §3 of our canon is the interdict ab ingressu ecclesiae, as defined in can. 2277.

If the cases mentioned in can. 2261, §2 and §3, or in can. 2270, are verified, a cleric may be admitted to the administration of the sacraments without incurring a penalty.

§4 of can. 2338 states that those who were the cause of a local interdict, or of an interdict laid upon a community or corporation, are ipso facto personally interdicted. The cause or reason is described in a Decretal of Boniface VIII as identical with, or at least correlated to, guilt, malice, or fraud.[18] Hence the persons affected are the principals in a crime, or the instigators or ringleaders, for instance, in a parish disturbance interdicted by the bishop. The consequence, of course, is that the privation attached to the personal interdict, as stated in can. 2275, takes effect. This is so true that, even if a privilege had been granted of not observing the interdict, it would not avail the person privileged if he were the cause of the interdict.[19]

17 C. in 6°, V, 7.

18 C. in 6°, V, 7: c. 24 Alma, 6°,V, 11.

19 What "causam dare" implies, see above page 214; it undoubtedly refers to the author or originator or ringleader of procedure forbidden by the Church under penalty of interdict.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

EXTORTION OF CHRISTIAN BURIAL

Can. 2339

Qui ausi fuerint mandare seu cogere tradi ecclesiasticae sepulturae infideles, apostatas a fide, vel haereticos, schismaticos, aliosve sive excommunicatos sive interdictos contra praescriptum can. 1240, § 1, contrahunt excommunicationem latae sententiae nemini reservatam; sponte vero sepulturam eisdem donantes, interdictum ab ingressu ecclesiae Ordinario reservatum.

What a Christian burial consists in is explained in can. 1204. It comprises the transfer of the corpse to the church, the exequies held in church, and burial in the graveyard. The principle that governs Christian burial is this: With those with whom we have had no communication in life, we should not communicate in death.[1] Since the Church honors those who died in her communion, and punishes those who despised her in life, it is an attempt against her authority to extort a favor which she refuses. A ceremonious or at least decent burial has ever been coveted by all whose sense of honesty and decency has not been entirely stifled. Therefore, societies, confraternities, and guilds surround the burial rite with much splendor. The Church is plainly entitled to show her respect for her faithful members and to refuse the honors of a Christian burial to those who disobeyed her. The privation of Christian burial is a penalty. Our canon says:

Those who dare to command or to compel (the Church authorities) to give a Christian burial to infidels,

1 C. 2, X, III, 28.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

apostates from the faith, heretics, schismatics, or other excommunicated or interdicted persons, contrary to the rule laid down in can. 1240, §1, incur the excommunication latae sententiae reserved to no one in particular.

1. The terms "mandantes" and "cogentes" are taken from the "Apostolicae Sedis," where, however, the phrase ausi fuerint is omitted. Commentators on the aforesaid Constitution are divided as to the intent of this command — whether it exclusively affects persons in authority, more particularly the public power, or private persons also.[2] A mandans, broadly speaking, is one who begs or orders some one else to do something in his name.[3] This, however, does not necessarily suppose public authority; any one may be a mandans, as any one may be a mandatarius, unless forbidden by law. Besides, there is no question here of protecting or defending a right, which was forfeited a priori. Therefore no appeal or recourse, as in can. 2333, is required or supposed, as if a violation of one's right had taken place.

Note that the text is not disjunctive, i. e., either — or. The word seu may just as well be taken in the sense of juxtaposition or opposition.[4] Therefore, the cogentes are closely related to the mandantes and may even be taken as differing from them merely by the means they employ. For whilst mandare means begging or commanding one to do something in another's name, cogere

2 § IV. 1. Mandantes seu cogentes tradi ecclesiasticae sepulturae haereticos notorios aut nominatim excommunicatos vel interdictos. ..

§ VI. 2. Scienter celebrantes vel celebrari facientes divina in locis ab Ordinario, vel delegato iudice, vel a iure interdictis, aut nominatim excommunicatos ad divina officia, seu ecclesiastica sacramenta, vel ecclesiasticam sepulturam admittentes, interdictum ab ingressu Ecclesiae ipso iure incurrunt, donec ad arbitrium eius, cuius sententiam contempserunt, competenter satisfecerint. (Apost. Sedis).

3 Pennacchi, l. c., II, 65 f.; Hollweck, l. c., p. 214, note 31; D'Annibale, l. c., p. 12, n. 12.

4 Disjunctive are vel—vel; aut—aut; seu or sive, in classical language, denotes and if, or if, even if, although.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

signifies to induce or impel one to do something by compulsion, grave fear, or serious threats.[5] Therefore, the mandantes or cogentes may be public or private persons, for instance, an assistant commanded or compelled by the pastor, dean, vicar-general, or bishop, or a mayor or governor, or a patron or private citizen, especially of the influential kind.[6] The term ausi fuerint presupposes knowledge and free will.[7]

2. The object of this command or compulsion must be ecclesiastical burial, which, as stated above, comprises three acts.

The question arises: Are all three acts equally essential to the burial service, so that if one of them were omitted, the penalty would not be incurred? It is an ancient controversy, which act precisely was forbidden or intended by the penal law. The more common opinion accepted the burial place as intended by the legislator, not the liturgical ceremonies and prayers. However, notwithstanding this being the common opinion before the promulgation of the Code, it must now, we think, be abandoned. For can. 1204 is decidedly against such an interpretation, and we cannot depart from the significance of a term so clearly defined by the legislator himself and then used without any further explanation. Therefore, we take Christian burial as defined in can. 1204, but will add an explanation. In our country the transfer of the body under liturgical prayer is not in vogue. Besides, it not infrequently happens that the body is not buried from the church. It may even be that it is buried in a non-Catholic cemetery, and 5 Pennacchi, l. c., II, p. 68. Thus also Eichmann, l. c., p. 159; what Cappello, l. c., p. 137, says, is meaningless.

6 Gravediggers, pallbearers, and other participants are not included.

7 Pennacchi, l. c., II, p. 68 ff.; Hollweck, l. c., p. 214, note 5.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

though this is contrary to the will of the Church (can. 1205, §1), no penalty is imposed. Consequently nothing remains of ecclesiastical burial but the exequies, or funeral services strictly so-called, i. e., the blessing before Mass, the Mass, and the absolutio. This no doubt constitutes the essence of Christian burial.[8] If only the grave can be blessed, as is the case where all are buried in a common graveyard, the locus sepulturae cannot be understood in our text. Times are different now, and unless we wish to maintain that this canon applies only to Catholic countries under normal conditions, we must admit that Christian burial here signifies merely the exequies, i. e., the blessing of the corpse before and after Mass, and the exequial Mass itself.

3. The persons whose bodies are not allowed to be given Christian burial, are:

a) Unbaptized persons or infidels. Concerning babies to be buried with their mother, we believe that the benign interpretation can safely be held, without incurring the penalty. The phrase ausi fuerint at least permits such an assumption.

b) Apostates from the faith, provided their apostasy was notorious;

c) Heretics and schismatics, provided they notoriously belonged to a non-Catholic sect or schismatic body;

d) Other excommunicated or interdicted persons, after a condemnatory or declaratory sentence.

According to canons 19 and 2219, § 1, the interpretation of such laws as this is both strict and benign. Therefore the burial of the other persons named in can. 1240, §1, n. 3-6 would not fall under the penal sanction of can. 2339. However, if, e. g., a Freemason had pro-

8 Thus also Eichmann, l. c., p. 159. Note should be taken of can. 1212 and 1241.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

voked a declaratory sentence, according to can. 2335, not only the prohibition, but the penalty also would take effect. Otherwise it is a mere prohibition.

4. Whilst so far only the mandantes seu cogentes were considered in connection with Christian burial, the second clause of can. 2339 punishes also those who, of their own accord, give a Christian burial to the persons enumerated above. These, being clerics, incur the interdict which prohibits them from entering any church, and it is reserved to the Ordinary.

The Ordinary of exempt clerical religious may here be understood to be their superior or the local Ordinary, inasmuch as burial concerns divine worship. Hence can. 616, § 2, is applicable here, but the penalty is incurred only if the ecclesiastical authority has granted ecclesiastical burial (i. e., funeral rites, as stated above, not merely interment) sponte, i. e., with full knowledge and freely, without being compelled by any one; therefore, even light fear would excuse him from the penalty.

PERSEVERANCE IN CENSURE

Can. 2340

§ 1. Si quis, obdurato animo, per annum insorduerit in censura excommunicationis, est de haeresi suspectus.

§ 2. Si clericus in censura suspensionis per semestre perseveraverit, graviter moneatur; et si, exacto a monitione mense, a contumacia non recesserit, privetur beneficiis aut officiis, si qua in Ecclesia forte habeat.

This canon contains two sections, one of which concerns excommunication, the other suspension.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1. Whoever stubbornly remains under a sentence of excommunication for one year, is suspected of heresy,[1] because it may be presumed that he spurns the Church, more especially the power of the keys, and therefore doubts an article of faith.[2] However, it is a simple presumption, not one iuris et de iure, and therefore any plausible reason, or an offer to prove that he was prevented from asking for absolution, would suffice to purge the culprit from the suspicion of obstinacy.

Obduracy also supposes a warning, which must take the form of a canonical admonition.[3] The law does not distinguish between an excommunication a iure and one ab homine, much less between a vitandus and a toleratus. Can. 2385 provides that an apostate from a religious organization, after a year or 13 months,[4] becomes suspect of heresy, if he does not return or take steps to be dispensed from his vows, or have himself secularized.

2. A cleric who remains for six months under the censure (not vindictive penalty) of suspension, must be seriously admonished; if he does not give up his contumacy within a month from the date of the warning, he is to be deprived of his benefice or the offices he may hold in the Church.

Although this text mentions only suspension, and, therefore, concerns only clerics, yet the penalty stated in §1 is not thereby quashed. Consequently, if a cleric should have contracted excommunication besides suspension, he would also incur the suspicion of heresy. The text requires a canonical warning, to be given according to can. 2309; otherwise contumacy cannot be presumed.

1 See Trid., Sess. 25, c. 3, de ref.; C. 7, 6°, V, 2.

2 Reiffenstuel, V, 39, n. 7.

3 Schmalzgrueber, V, 39, n. 195; see can. 2309.

4 See can. 642, § 1, 2.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A doubt may arise as to what kind of suspension is here intended, general or special. Can. 2278, § 2 seems to point to a general suspension, and therefore, a special suspension from either office or benefice, or a partial one, would not seem to fall under this canon.[5]

VIOLATION OF THE PRIVILEGIUM FORI

Can. 2341

Si quis contra praescriptum can. 120 ausus fuerit ad iudicem laicum trahere aliquem ex S. R. E. Cardinalibus vel Legatis Sedis Apostolicae, vel Officialibus maioribus Romanae Curiae ob negotia ad eorum munus pertinentia, vel Ordinarium proprium, contrahit ipso facto excommunicationem Sedi Apostolicae speciali modo reservatam; si alium Episcopum etiam mere titularem, aut Abbatem vel Praelatum nullius, vel aliquem ex supremis religionum iuris pontificii Superioribus, excommunicationem latae sententiae Sedi Apostolicae simpliciter reservatam; demum si, non obtenta ab Ordinario loci licentia, aliam personam privilegio fori fruentem, clericus quidem incurrit ipso facto in suspensionem ab officio reservatam Ordinario, laicus autem congruis poenis pro gravitate culpae a proprio Ordinario puniatur.

The privilegium fori has been explained under can. 120. Here the penal sanction is stated, which concerns only the actual violators, not the framers or makers of laws contrary to the personal immunity of the clergy.[1] The latter are comprised by can. 2334, n. 1.

5 Thus Eichmann, l. c., p. 160; c. 8, X, I, 14 as well as other commentators; Schmalzgrueber (V, 39, n. 197) simply says suspension, without further determination.

1 The "Apostolicae Sedis," I, 7,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The present canon distributes the clergy into three classes, with a special penalty for the aggressors of each.

I. Excommunication reserved modo speciali to the Holy See is incurred ipso facto by those who dare to drag before a lay judge (civil court) cardinals, legates of the Apostolic See or higher officials of the Roman Court concerning affairs which belong to their office, or their own Ordinary.

1. "Trahere ad iudicem laicum" means to compel one to appear before a lay judge, who has no jurisdiction over clerics, who have a judge of their own. But trahere (to drag) must not be understood literally, as if it required physical compulsion, e. g., by a policeman.

The act declared punishable in this canon begins with the summons and ends with the final sentence and its execution. However, the term also has the definite meaning of an accomplished fact. Therefore, a mere judiciary summons, if unheeded or retracted, would not constitute the crime here intended. Even if a subpoena[2] should have been issued, the crime would not be established if the defendant would not appear.[3] Denouncing a clergyman to the State's attorney would not fall under this canon, though it might be classified as an inchoate crime.[4] On the other hand, the mere fact of being called and compelled to take the witness stand, is sufficient,[5] for this is a judiciary act and supposes a tribunal. Neither does it matter whether the clergysays: "Cogentes sive directe, sive indirecte iudices laicos ad trahendum ad suum tribunal personas ecclesiasticas praeter canonicas dispositiones: item edentes leges vel decreta contra libertatem aut iura Ecclesiae."

2 A subpoena is a judicial writ commanding a party or witness to appear in court under penalty; Stimson's Law Dictionary, s. v.

3 This is evident from the "Quantavis diligentia," of Pius X, Oct. 9, 1911 (A. Ap. S., III, 555): "qui ad tribunal laicorum vocent ibique adesse publice compellant."

4 See can. 2212; Eichmann, l. c., p. 164.

5 See Vol. II, p. 63 f. of this Commentary.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

man wins or loses the suit, or is remunerated or compensated.

The Code here again employs the words "ausus fuerit," which suppose a knowledge of the unlawfulness of the act proscribed. One must know that the person thus called to court is a cleric in possession of his clerical privileges;[6] also that there is a privileged court for Catholic clergymen. If inculpable ignorance existed on this point, the plaintiff would not incur the penalty. If he knew of the privilegium fori, but not of the penalty here stated, his responsibility would be diminished.[7] From this it may logically be deduced that lower officials who arrest a cleric and hale him into court because the laws of the country demand it, are immune from this penalty. But private citizens, who effectively denounce, summon, subpoena or bring suit against a clergyman cannot escape the penalty, suppositis supponendis, as just stated. It makes no difference whether the judge before whom a cleric is haled sits in the civil or in the criminal court, for no distinction is made.

2. The persons who must not be brought into the civil courts are:

a) The cardinals of the Holy Roman Church, because they are of princely rank and constitute the immediate senate of the Pope;

b) The legates of the Apostolic See, whether nuncios, internuncios, or Apostolic delegates; for can. 265 appears to include this threefold class as representatives of the Pope;

c) The higher officials of the Roman Court. These are not specifically determined, but may be described as follows:

6 See can. 123, 2304, 2305.

7 See can. 2202.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

For the Holy Office, the assessor and the commissarius;

For the Congregatio Consistorialis, the assessor and the substitutus;

For the Congregatio de Sacramentis, the praelatus a secretis and the three subsecretarii;

For the Congregatio Concilii, the praelatus a secretis and the subsecretarius; and similarly for the other congregations, which are made up in the same way. If we do not mention the Cardinal Prefect, who also belongs to the higher officials, it is because cardinals are expressly exempted as such.

The Tribunals of the Holy See comprise:

The Poenitentiaria, with the cardinal Poenitentiarius, the regent, the secretary, and the substitute;

The Signatura Apostolica with its secretary;

The Romana Rota with its auditors, promotor iustitiae, and defensor vinculi.

The Offices comprise:

The Cancellaria Apostolica with its regent and substitute;

The Dataria Apostolica with its subdatary and prefect;

The Camera Apostolica with the vice-camerlengo, auditor general, and treasurer general.

None of these higher officials may be brought before a lay court on account of affairs which pertain to their office. This phrase does not refer to the cardinals or legates, but to the officials just named. The importance of the matter and their close relation to the Pope requires a higher sanction for their immunity.[9]

8 The "Sapienti consilio" of Pius X, June 29, 1908 refers to administri maiores, who are identical with the officiales maiores (A. Ap. S., I, 78 ff.).

9 If these higher officials were cited before a lay judge for matters of a private character, inheritance, property, affairs of relatives,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

d) One's own Ordinary is here classed with the highest persons, and offenders against this enactment are threatened with severe penalties because the Ordinaries are immediate representatives of the Pope, upon whom their jurisdiction depends. Therefore an attack against them is a qualified offence by reason of the implied contempt of a higher authority.[10] Note that the text simply says "Ordinary," without the addition: "local." Therefore, if a religious of an exempt clerical order should dare to hale his own superior into a civil court, he would incur the penalty stated above. To bring any of these personages before a lay court requires permission from the Apostolic See.[11]

II. Excommunication latae sententiae, simply reserved to the Apostolic See, is incurred by those who dare to drag before a lay judge another bishop (i. e., not their own Ordinary), or a titular bishop, or an abbot nullius or prelate nullius, or one of the major superiors of religious of papal institutes. Who these major superiors are, is plainly stated in can. 488, n. 8. If such persons are to be brought into court, the permission of the Apostolic See must be obtained.[12]

III. Those who dare to bring before a lay court any other persons endowed with the clerical privilege, the privilegium fori, are, if permission has not been obtained from the local Ordinary, to be punished as follows:

1. A cleric who dares to bring another cleric before the lay court ipso facto incurs suspension from office reserved to the Ordinary;

2. A layman must be punished by his own Ordinary according to the gravity of the guilt.

the penalty stated in the first clause would not be incurred, but one of the following (2) clauses would be applicable according to the hierarchical rank: titular bishops, clergymen, (to which latter also belong monsignori).

10 See can 2207, n. 1.

11 See can. 120, § 2.

12 Ibid.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The other persons here meant are those not specially mentioned under I and II; hence all clerics of secular rank, from vicar-general down to those who have received the first tonsure; of religious superiors all those who do not go by the name of higher superiors (generals, provincials and those who hold power equal to provincials), i. e., all religious except those mentioned, of male as well as female organizations, and their novices.

A difficulty remains concerning exempt clerical religious. These must obtain permission from the local — not the religious — superior in order lawfully to hale either a secular or religious cleric into court. But to whom is the suspension reserved? As the text does not here repeat the "loci" of the first clause, it follows that the Code means their own superior, not the local Ordinary, to whom they are not subject. There is no contradiction in this. For the obtaining of permission is a matter of public discipline for the whole diocese, but a reservation that belongs to the Order is of mere ecclesiastical jurisdiction. The suspension from office is to be understood according to can. 2279, §1.

What we have said elsewhere [13] concerning concordats and custom, can safely be applied to our country.

PAPAL ENCLOSURE

Can. 2342

Plectuntur ipso facto excommunicatione Sedi Apostolicae simpliciter reservata:

1°. Clausuram monialium violantes, cuiuscunque generis aut conditionis vel sexus sint, in earum monasteria sine legitima licentia ingrediendo, pariterque

[13] Vol. II, p. 64.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

eos introducentes vel admittentes; quod si clerici sint, praeterea suspendantur per tempus pro gravitate culpae ab Ordinario definiendum;

2°. Mulieres violantes regularium virorum clausuram et Superiores aliique, quicunque ii sint, eas cuiuscunque aetatis introducentes vel admittentes; et praeterea religiosi introducentes vel admittentes priventur officio, si quod habeant, et voce activa ac passiva;

3°. Moniales e clausura illegitime exeuntes contra praescriptum can. 601.

This whole canon concerns regulars and nuns only; therefore, even exempt religious of male congregations, and all female religious with simple, even though perpetual, vows are not affected by it. The text treats first of the enclosure of nuns, then of that of regulars, and, finally, of nuns unlawfully leaving the cloister.[1]

I. Those who, no matter of what rank or condition or sex they be, violate the enclosure of nuns by entering their monasteries without lawful permission; likewise those who introduce or admit such violators, ipso facto incur the excommunication simply reserved to the Apostolic See. If they are clerics, they shall, besides, be suspended for a time to be determined by the Ordinary according to the gravity of the crime.

1. The enclosure is the whole space contained within the precincts of a monastery, and assigned as such.[2]

1 Apostolicae Sedis, § II, n. 6, 7: Violantes clausuram monialium cuiuscumque generis aut conditionis, sexus vel aetatis fuerint, in earum monasteria absque legitima licentia ingrediendo; pariterque eos introducentes vel admittentes; itemque Moniales ab illa exeuntes extra casus ac formam a S. Pio V. in Constitutione "Decori" praescriptam. Mulieres violantes Regularium virorum clausuram, et Superiores aliosve eas admittentes.

2 Gibalini, S. J., Disquisitiones

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Note that the limits once drawn cannot be arbitrarily changed. The constant practice of the Roman Court demands that the bishop superintend the enclosure of nuns;[3] to him also must be referred any change of the limits.

2. The violantes are here determined, first, as ingredientes, which means that the law[4] of enclosure is trespassed by one entering the limits or threshold with his whole body, and without the necessary permission. This is given and determined by can. 600, which permits the local Ordinaries and superiors regular, the confessor or his substitute, the actual rulers and their wives and suite, and Cardinals to enter the precincts for certain reasons there stated. Besides, the superiors may also admit, if necessary and with the permission of the local Ordinary, physicians, surgeons, and workingmen. These, therefore, are permitted to enter and do not incur the penalty of this canon, provided the conditions set forth in can. 600 are verified. Where there is a case of violation of the enclosure, neither descent (birth), nor social condition, or sex makes any difference. But age does. For the Code does not add aetatis and therefore impuberes, according to can. 2230, do not incur the penalty here mentioned, although they, too, are forbidden to enter the enclosure.

3. Introducentes or admittentes. The former term signifies effective invitation, or leading the way by opening the gate (private entrance), provided the introducing person (one of the nuns) is on the inside and Canonicae de Clausura Regulari, Lugduni 1648, p. 51; D'Annibale, l. c., p. 82, n. 123.

3 We could allege many decrees of the S. C. EE. et RR., which we have perused in Rome; but the papal constitutions suffice.

4 Older laws; Carth. III, can. 33 etc., (Gibalini, l. c., p. 5; Hollweck, l. c., p. 221 f.); c. un. 6°, III, 16; Trid., Sess. 25, c. 5, de regg.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google really coöperates in the induction of a forbidden person.

To admit means: not to prohibit or not to close the entrance if this is necessary and can easily be done. This, some authors say, is the duty of the superioress and portress only.[5] Others extend it to all persons (nuns) who can and may easily prevent an unlawful entrance.[6] Of course, the rules of politeness, shyness, and circumstances may keep one from mentioning the law of enclosure if this has already been trespassed, and in this case certainly the censure would not be incurred.

Those who merely counsel or command the violation, for instance, an Ordinary who would unjustly order it, would not incur excommunication.[7]

II. The enclosure of regulars is violated by women entering it, by superiors and others, whoever they be, who introduce or admit women of whatever age. All these incur the ipso facto excommunication simply reserved to the Apostolic See. The religious who introduce or admit women, must be deprived of the office they hold and also of the active and passive vote.

1. What is to be understood by the name of enclosure has been stated above.[8] However, what Suarez says, seems to be very reasonable and more adapted to the real condition existing in monasteries of male religious: "What is to be understood by the name of cloister, and where it ends, must be judged from the locality, form,

5 Gibalini, l. c., p. 165; D'Annibale, l. c., p. 83, n. 123.

6 Pennacchi, l. c., I, 742; Hollweck, l. c., p. 225, note 12.

7 D'Annibale, l. c. However, this must be rightly understood; for religious superiors who would command it, would not escape the penalty; such an interpretation would render the law ridiculous and nullify its effect.

8 Ferraris, Prompta Bibliotheca, s. v. "Conventus," art. III, n. 9 f; cemeteries, courtyard, cells, dormitories, refectory, infirmary, kitchen, also gardens if joined to the monastery, the sacristy if it has only an entrance from the enclosure, but not the choir of the church; thus also D'Annibale, p. 85, n. 127.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

and custom, and especially from the declaration of the prelate, which must be in conformity with the respective constitutions and religious discipline."[9] This, we say, is a very reasonable interpretation, because not all monasteries are built the same way, or surrounded by the same conditions. But one thing is certain, viz.: that the prelate is not at liberty to change the limits of the enclosure arbitrarily. They must be determined once for all and may be changed only in case of real necessity, and then permanently, not ad hoc, i. e., merely to escape the law. Such a procedure would render the supreme legislator ridiculous and the object of enclosure nugatory.[10] An enclosure for regulars, no matter how small it be, must be definitely assigned. This is the will of the lawgiver, and it is most reasonable.

2. The violators here intended are women, not men. Exempted from this rule are the wives of actual rulers and their suite. In the U. S. there are no such rulers (qui supremum actu tenent principatum; can. 598, §2); if any come as visitors from foreign countries, a president's or governor's wife accompanying them might be admitted.[11]

3. Here again the introducentes and admittentes are mentioned, and the term is more clearly explained. They are the superiors and others. The name superior comprises all superiors, whether higher or lower, general, provincial or local. The procurator and other officials go here by the name of "others." By alii were formerly understood only religious,——— clerics, lay brothers, or 9 De Relig., c. I, c. 7, n. 2 (ed. Paris., 1860, Vol. XVI, 41).

10 The purpose is: servanda castitas, scandalum praecavendum et necessarius spiritus recollectionis.

11 Yet it would be no rigorous interpretation to say that since such rulers do not actually rule in our country, their wives may therefore be excluded.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

novices, not outsiders.[12] This interpretation was justified by the text of the "Apostolicae Sedis." But as the Code adds: "quicunque ii sint," we believe that a wider interpretation is now justified, i. e., any one who knowingly and freely introduces or admits women into the enclosure, whether he be a lay janitor or a hired man, or an employee of the monastery. Those, however, who have nothing to do with the monastery, are excluded, because they have no right either to introduce or to admit others.

Note the phrase cuiuscunque aetatis, no matter of what age these women be, old or young; also those between twelve and seven years of age; and, we believe, also infants, viz., girls who have not yet reached the age of seven. It is quite true that the commentators on the "Apostolicae Sedis" exempted those not yet seven years of age, because not capable of guilt.[13] But it should be noted that said Constitution employs the clause "of whatever age" under the enclosure of nuns, but omits it under the enclosure of men. Our text on the other hand connects this clause with the introducentes, and hence we maintain that it was done purposely, so that no women or girls of whatever age may be introduced by the religious under penalty of excommunication. Neither does the fact that these infants (septennio minores) are not capable of guilt affect the merit of the question; for the guilt is referred to the introducentes. Of course, if the introducentes can not distinguish a boy from a girl — which mistake is possible — no censure is incurred.

Note that the purpose of entering, introducing or admitting any one to the enclosure, whether good or bad, 12 Thus D'Annibale, l. c., p. 85, n. 128; Hollweck, l. c., p. 229, note 5.

13 Thus, we say, by general interpretation; for the S. C. EE. et RR. included also pueros et puellas; March 16, 1593; June 10, 1650: Regesta of the respective years, Reg. fol. 118, fol. 260; see can. 2230.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google does not change the nature of the law or quash the penalty.

The penalty for religious is privation of their offices and of the active and passive vote. This also concerns the superiors, of whatever rank, as is evident from former papal Constitutions.[14]

But since it is ferendae sententiae, which certainly requires a declaratory sentence, it follows that concerning exempt religious the declaration would have to be given by their respective immediate superior, otherwise by the Congregatio Religiosorum, to which such cases might be brought.

Simple religious must be deprived of their office and ballot by their immediate superior.

Concerning dispensation and absolution in occult cases see can. 2237, §3.

III. Nuns with solemn vows, who leave the enclosure against the law, as stated in can. 601, ipso facto incur the excommunication simply reserved to the Apostolic See.

To leave the enclosure means to put the whole body outside the limits assigned, no matter for how long a time or for what purpose.[15] The reasons which permit this are imminent danger of death or fear of a very serious evil. The former law mentioned as reasons: fire leprosy, and epidemics.[16] This may safely be extended to 14 Pius V, "Regularium," Oct. 24, 1506, § 4; Grebory XIII, "Ubi gratiae," June 13, 1575, § 3; Bened. XIV, "Regularis disciplinę," Jan. 3, 1745, § 5.

15 We read many and curious cases of leaving brought to the S. Congregation; a nun gathering apples on a tree, a limb of which she climbed and thus happened to find herself outside the wall;— acquiescent; a nun climbing the housetop, which seemed more serious;— at least provisional absolution. But unlawful here implies acting knowingly against the law, and therefore cases like those just mentioned should not cause scruples.

16 Epidemic may be justly taken for a contagious or even infectious disease, such as consumption, even influenza; there is also the necessity of undergoing an operation.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google earthquakes and sudden invasions, or serious danger to virtue.

Absolution in occult cases may be granted by the local Ordinary according to can. 2237, §2. But in public cases bishops can absolve only if they have a general faculty (can. 2253, n. 1).

VIOLATION OF THE PRIVILEGIUM CANONIS

Can. 2343

§ 1. Qui violentas manus in personam Romani Pontificis iniecerit:

1°. Excommunicationem contrahit latae sententiae Sedi Apostolicae specialissimo modo reservatam; et est ipso facto vitandus;

2°. Est ipso iure infamis;

3°. Clericus est degradandus.

§ 2. Qui in personam S. R. E. Cardinalis vel Legati Romani Pontificis:

1°. In excommunicationem incurrit latae sententiae Sedi Apostolicae speciali modo reservatam;

2°. Est ipso iure infamis;

3°. Privetur beneficiis, officiis, dignitatibus, pesionibus et quolibet munere, si quod in Ecclesia habeat.

§ 3. Qui in personam Patriarchae, Archiepiscopi, Episcopi etiam titularis tantum, incurrit in excommunicationem latae sententiae Sedi Apostolicae speciali modo reservatam.

§ 4. Qui in personam aliorum clericorum vel utriusque sexus religiosorum, subiaceat ipso facto excommunicationi Ordinario proprio reservatae, qui praeterea aliis poenis, si res ferat, pro suo prudenti arbitrio eum puniat.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This canon contains two censures which the "Apostolicae Sedis"[1] placed under distinct headings. Here they are combined under the one species of personal inviolability, or the so-called privilegium canonis, the historical basis of which has been explained elsewhere.[2]

"Violentas manus iniicere" is a remnant of the famous old canon, "Si quis suadente diabolo." Malicious intent is presumed if the action is such as to hurt and offend the person against whom it is directed.

1. Violent implies that the person be really injured.

a) A bodily offence is one committed against the physical nature or constitution of a man (in corpus). To this class belong all acts of felonious murder, manslaughter, maiming,[3] assault, battery and wounding. Tantamount to felonious assault would be the administration of poison or other noxious things which inflict grievous bodily harm.[4] As to wounding, the skin must be broken; a mere scratch is no wound.[5]

b) Personal, physical injury may also be committed by interfering with one's liberty (in libertatem). Thus capturing or imprisoning or detaining a person against his will must be styled violence. For "to deprive another person of his liberty will usually involve either

1 § 5. "Omnes interficientes, mutilantes, percutientes, capientes, carcerantes, detinentes, vel hostiliter insequentes S. R. C. Cardinales, Patriarchas, Archiepiscopos, Episcopos, Sedisque Apostolicae Legatos, vel Nuncios, aut eos a suis dioecesibus, territoriis, terris seu dominiis eiicientes, necnon ea mandantes vel rata habentes seu praestantes in eis auxilium, vel favorem." § II, 2: "Violentas manus, suadente diabolo, injicientes in Clericos, vel utriusque sexus Monachos, exceptis quoad reservationem casibus et personis, de quibus iure vel privilegio permittitur, ut Episcopus aut alius absolvat."

2 See Vol. II, p. 58 of this Commentary.

3 Maiming from mayhem; thus to cut off a finger or even to knock out a front tooth would be mayhem; Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 135.

4 Ibid., p. 137; D'Annibale, l. c., p. 35, n. 50.

5 Kenny-Webb, l. c.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

touching or threatening to touch him."[6] Detention may be such as to shut one up in his room or home.[7]

c) A person may also suffer bodily harm in his dignity, or official condition, or social position. Thus pursuing a man, ejecting him from his own property, house or premises constitutes a physical injury, provided it is done in a hostile spirit, even though no immediate contact is involved between the assailant and the assailed. Thus merely spitting at a person, or bespattering him with mud or rotten eggs, etc., would constitute an indictable offence; also stopping a horse or automobile with hostile intent or striking the horse or shaking the vehicle so as to throw out the rider, would be considered a hostile act.[8]

2. The action must not only be violent, but also injurious, i. e., affect the person contumeliously against his own will and be perpetrated with knowledge of the injury done. Consequently:

a) Self-defence is not injurious, for the injured must impute it to his own conduct if he is injured in the act of aggression. Hence self-defence is permitted if practiced hic et nunc and the amount of force used does not exceed the immediate need. This is also extended to the defence of one's wife, mother, sister, and daughter.[9]

b) Knowledge of injury is absent if the violence is committed against a cleric who is not known as such. Therefore, if a cleric has been reduced to the lay state,[10] the penalty would not be incurred, even though he would

6 Ibid., p. 143.

7 D'Annibale, l. c., p. 71, n. 109; p. 35, n. 50.

8 Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 142; D'Annibale, l. c., p. 35, n. 50.

9 C. 3, X, V, 39. Defence of one's property (Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 144) is not acknowledged in Church law; Hollweck, l. c., p. 219, note 3.

10 See can. 136, § 3; 141 § 2; 211, § 1, 2; 640; 2305, § 1; 2387.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

wear the clerical dress with a big tonsure on his head. If one would try to strike at James, a cleric, but hit Brutus, also a cleric, he would incur the penalty, because the privilege is not individual, but attached to the clerical state.[11] But no penalty is attached to the corrective striking or beating of children, provided the chastisement is reasonable and the instrument one not likely to inflict serious bodily harm, and provided the percussus be not in sacris.[12] Some authors [13] also exempt the case of sudden anger or wrath; which may be accepted, provided can. 2206 is verified. An involuntary striking or wounding or even killing of a cleric must be judged according to can. 2203, §2, and is generally immune from penalty. Finally, it may be stated that only the actual perpetrator is punishable and instigators or counselors are not included in this penalty.

After this somewhat lengthy exposition we have but to explain the penalties, which are graded according to the dignity of the offended person, as per can. 2207, n. 1.

1. Those who lay violent hands on the person of the Roman Pontiff:

a) incur the excommunication latae sententiae reserved modo specialissimo to the Apostolic See and are ipso facto vitandi (can. 2285);

b) they are also infamous ipso iure (see can. 2293, 2294, §1), but this infamy no longer [14] passes to the relatives and descendants of the offender.

c) A cleric guilty of this crime must be degraded, which is ferendae sententiae.

11 Thus also D'Annibale, p. 74, n. 110.

12 C. 54, X, V, 39; Kenny-Webb, p. 100.

13 S. Alphonsus, VII, 575; D'Annibale, l. c.

14 Formerly it did; see c. 17, C. 6, q. 1; c. 22, C. 11, q. 1; c. 5, 6°, V, 9; c. 1, Clem. V, 8, because it was treated as treason; the histories of Leo III, Gregory VII, and Boniface VIII furnish examples.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2. Those who lay violent hands on a Cardinal or legate of the Roman Pontiff (or Apostolic delegate)

a) incur excommunication latae sententiae reserved speciali modo to the Apostolic See;

b) are ipso iure infamous,

c) must be deprived of their benefices, offices, dignities, pensions, and every ecclesiastical charge they may hold.

3. Those who lay violent hands on a patriarch, archbishop, bishop (diocesan or titular) incur excommunication latae sententiae reserved modo speciali to the Apostolic See.

4 Those who lay violent hands on the person of other clerics or religious of either sex ipso facto incur the excommunication reserved to their own Ordinary, who may inflict additional penalties if in his prudent judgment he should deem it proper or if the case demands it.

This last section calls for a few remarks.

1. Clerics are all men dedicated to the divine mysteries by at least the first tonsure (can. 108, §1), unless, as already stated, they have been reduced to the lay state.

2. Religious, in the sense of the Code (can. 488, n. 7), are all those who have taken the three vows and live in an approved religious institute. The same privilege is also accorded to religious associations, according to can. 680. The novices (but not the postulants) of both kinds of organizations enjoy the same favor, but not hermits, who live for themselves, though with the approval of the ecclesiastical authority and wear a religious habit, nor secular tertiaries.[15]

15 D'Annibale, p. 73, n. 108, expresses a doubt concerning such hermits as had received the religious habit at the hands of a bishop; but these are not religious.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

3. Whether the so-called percussio be enormis, or mediocris, or levis, the Ordinary may absolve from it. And the Ordinary of exempt religious is their superior major general, provincial, guardian, rector, or conventual prior, all of whom may absolve from any kind of violatio canonis. If the superior himself should be guilty of such an excess, he may give his confessor the faculty to absolve him. In case of non-exempt religious, the Ordinary in whose diocese the percussor lives as a member of a religious family, is competent to absolve him.[16]

PUBLIC VERBAL INJURIES

Can. 2344

Qui Romanum Pontificem, S. R. E. Cardinalem, Legatum Romani Pontificis, Sacras Congregationes Romanas, Tribunalia Sedis Apostolicae eorumque Officiales maiores, proprium Ordinarium publicis ephemeridibus, concionibus, libellis sive directe sive indirecte, iniuriis affecerit, aut simultates vel odia contra eorundem acta, decreta, decisiones, sententias excitaverit, ab Ordinario non solum ad instantiam partis, sed etiam ex officio adigatur, per censuras quoque, ad satisfactionem praestandam, aliisve congruis poenis vel poenitentiis, pro gravitate culpae et scandali reparatione, puniatur.

Pseudo-Isidore ascribes to Pius I a text resembling our canon.[1] This Decretal was to protect bishops against insidious attacks, contumelies, calumnies and all kinds 16 If the case should be brought to a trial before the ordinary, the latter would become competent to absolve also exempt religious ratione deliciti.

1 C. 18, C. 11, q. 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of verbal injuries. Clement III (1187-1191) complained of a cleric who deprecated the "office and benefice" (sic!) of the Roman Pontiff or the Roman Church in the presence of many.[2] No doubt this latter Decretal is the material source of our canon. But the Roman law, too, contained a title "De Iniuriis et Famosis Libellis," and punished especially injuries against higher personages.[3] The English law treats the scandalum magnatum as a heinous crime.[4] It is but natural that the Code should protect dignitaries of the Church against possible and probable attacks.

1. The persons here mentioned are: the Roman Pontiff, the Cardinals, the papal legates, the Roman Congregations, the Tribunals of the Roman Court and their higher officials, as explained above,[5] and one's own Ordinary; therefore also the superiors of exempt clerical institutes, provided the attack comes from one of their own members.

2. The acts which are declared liable to punishment are: iniuriis afficere or simultates aut odia excitare against their acts (documents), decrees, decisions, sentences.

a) The word injuries is here to be taken strictly in the sense of verbal injuries. An injury is an act done against law or right.[6] An injury, says Labeo, may be inflicted either by deeds or words. To the latter class the Roman lawyers gave the name convicium, either singular or plural. The canonists speak of them under the title De Maledictis[7] and divide maledictum into detraction, calumny, and blasphemy. The last-named crime, however, does not concern the present subject,

2 C. 1, X, V, 26.
3 Dig. 47, 10.
4 Blackstone-Cooley, l. c., III, 123.
5 See can. 2341.
6 L. 1, Dig. 47, 10: iniuria ex eo dicta est, quod non iure fiat.
7 Tit. 26, lib. V.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

for blasphemy is a strictly religious crime. There is a slight difference of opinion between canonists and moralists as to the definition of detraction and calumny. The commentators[8] on the above-named title define detraction as any defamation of a person in his absence, and calumny as an insult made in the face of the person. The moralists[9] define detraction in general as an unjust violation of the good name of a neighbor who is absent. Under this general notion they subsume simple detraction, which they call imputation of a real but unknown crime; calumny they call imputation of a false crime or a crime not committed by the person to whom it is attributed. In English we style all detractions slanders if spoken, and libels if written. A libel is a writing or picture which either defames an individual or injures religion, government or morals. Defamatory or private libel is a crime which not only is a tort, but is often treated as such in actual practice.[10] Since the Church has doubtless taken the body of her criminal law from the old Roman law, it is not too much to say that the civil law, as understood at present, should be consulted as to the constituent elements of slander and libel.[11] Therefore we may assume that the injuries in question should be of an actionable character, and it is the function of the judge to decide whether the deed, word or writing impugned is capable of bearing the alleged defamatory meaning.

b) Simultates vel odia excitare are wider terms and difficult of precise definition. The former properly means aversion, a secret grudge, or animosity. But how 8 See Reiffenstuel, V, 26, n. 3. Blackstone-Cooley, l. c., III, 112 ff.

9 See Arregui, l. c., n. 427.
10 Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 297;
11 Hollweck, l. c., p. 277, note 1.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google a judge can determine secret thoughts is hard to understand. Odia is more tangible, because it signifies the manifestations of hatred, for instance, imprecations, threats, outbursts of irreverent speech, etc. However, no objective criticism on the value and truth of these documents is here intended. Neither would ridicule or a jocose travesty constitute an offence. Notice well that animosity and hatred are connected with official documents issued by the above-named persons, while iniuria afficere may be referred only to distinguished persons, because dignity or official character is impaired by injuries.

3. The means by which slander and libel may be conveyed to others are: magazines, speeches, pamphlets, etc.

a) Ephemerides are periodicals published regularly, i. e., at stated times, principally magazines; newspapers are not comprised in the term.

b) Conciones may be either lectures, or discourses, or sermons, or catechetical instructions, in which a subject is treated systematically.

c) Libelli are pamphlets of some size, i. e., booklets, not mere leaflets.

d) All these may contain an injury, or excite animosity or hatred, either directly or indirectly. Directly if a specified person or body, for instance, a congregation, is assailed; indirectly if, e. g., the Roman Court would be called corrupt or immoral, or if a diocese or episcopal see were insulted. Directly may also refer to a specified crime imputed, for instance, bribery; indirectly would then mean by innuendo a certain tendency or class of crimes.

4. The penalty is stated as follows: the Ordinary should not only proceed upon complaint or indictment,

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google but should prosecute offenders officially (criminally) by censures if necessary. He may also inflict other suitable penalties and penances, as the gravity of the crime and the reparation of scandal may demand.

USURPING AND RETAINING PROPERTY AND RIGHTS OF THE ROMAN CHURCH

Can. 2345

Usurpantes vel detinentes per se vel per alios bona aut iura ad Ecclesiam Romanam pertinentia, subiaceant excommunicationi latae sententiae speciali modo Sedi Apostolicae reservatae; et si clerici fuerint, praeterea dignitatibus, beneficiis, officiis, pensionibus priventur atque inhabiles ad eadem declarentur.

The Roman Church from the earliest times possessed property, which went by the name of patrimony of St. Peter, and was scattered over the Italian peninsula, Sicily and Sardinia, nay even in Spain and France. In the course of the eighth century this property received the form of a Roman Duchy and was enriched by Pippin's donations. Civil and political strifes of the Roman, Tuscan, and Spoletan nobility and the interference of the Teutonic rulers in Italian and ecclesiastical affairs shaped the Duchy on the Tiber into a politico-ecclesiastical State, for which the popes, the born defenders of forsaken Rome, fought tenaciously against foreign invaders. Thus out of the material patrimony of St. Peter, conjointly with the civil-ecclesiastical authority of the Roman pontiffs, grew what is known as the temporal dominion of the popes. This is the immediate object of our canon, which is taken in a modified form

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

from the "Apostolicae Sedis."[1] A year after the promulgation of this Constitution (1870) Italia Unita became a fait accompli at the cost of the Papal States. The Law of Guarantees was devised to smooth the worst features of that inexcusable usurpation. Under its provisions the Pope was to continue to enjoy the Apostolic Palaces of the Vatican and the Lateran, with all the buildings, gardens, and plots connected with them, as well as the Villa of Castel Gandolfo with all its appurtenances and dependencies; also the museums, library, and artistic and archæological collections therein contained.[2] Of the iura or sovereign rights the law guaranteed the inviolability of the person of the Sovereign Pontiff, also his right, active and passive, of embassy with all the privileges (extraterritoriality and immunity) attached thereto; also, if he pleases, to have his own post office and telegraph service or to entrust it to the Italian government, free of charge. This is the condition of the papacy at present, at least on paper. Remonstrances, of course, were not wanting, and the present canon, although modified, is a reminder to the royal and parliamentary offenders. We shall not attempt to enter into an interpretation of this canon, as it deals with a delicate subject, which the Roman Court alone can handle adequately. Only one observation: the term bona et iura Romanae Ecclesiae may have a wider sense, inasmuch as all property and all rights, wherever found, may be concerned, provided they are held in the name of the Roman Church, as a legal corporation.[2]

1 § I, 12. Invadentes, destruentes, per se vel per alios civitates, terras, loca aut iura ad Ecclesiam Romanam pertinentia; vel usurpantes, perturbantes, retinentes supremam iurisdictionem in eis nec non ad singula praedicta auxilium, concilium, favorem praebentes.

2 Art. 6; see Prior, Is the Pope Independent? or Outlines of the

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Those who usurp or detain, personally or through others, property or rights belonging to the Roman Church,[3] incur excommunication latae sententiae, reserved modo speciali to the Apostolic See. If the guilty ones are clerics they must be deprived of their dignities, benefices, offices, and pensions, and be declared incapable of holding such. This clerical penalty is ferendae sententiae.

The question has been asked: Does the present King of Italy fall under the excommunication formulated in this canon? He is not a usurper, but merely one who detains or holds or occupies property that was usurped by another, and in this sense authors maintain that "to retain" means the same as "not to restore,"[4] But is there a moral imputability? We hardly believe so; for the King alone could not restore the Papal States.[5] Deputies and senators are not responsible as individuals.[6]

USURPATION AND SECULARIZATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY

Can. 2346

Si quis bona ecclesiastica cuiuslibet generis, sive mobilia sive immobilia, sive corporalia sive incorporalia, per se vel per alios in proprios usus convertere et usurpare praesumpserit aut impedire ne eorundem fructus seu reditus ab iis, ad quos iure pertinent, percipiantur, excommunicationi tandiu subiaceat, quandiu bona ipsa integre restituerit, praedictum im-

Roman Question, 1907, p. 127 f.

3 But it would be improper to identify this property with the Roman See (Ayrinhac, p. 275); our text means only the Roman Church, understood as a political and ecclesiastical corporation, distinct from the Catholic Church at large.

4 Thus D'Annibale, p. 67, n. 100, note 6.

5 Thus also Eichmann, l. c., p. 170.

6 D'Annibale, l. c.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

pedimentum removerit, ac deinde a Sede Apostolica absolutionem impetraverit; quod si eiusdem ecclesiae seu bonorum patronus fuerit, etiam iure patronatus eo ipso privatus exsistat; clericus vero, hoc delictum committens vel in eodem consentiens, privetur praeterea beneficiis quibuslibet, ad alia quaelibet inhabilis efficiatur et a suorum ordinum exsecutione, etiam post integram satisfactionem et absolutionem, sui Ordinarii arbitrio suspendatur.

This canon aims at protecting the right claimed in can. 1495. It is not necessary to repeat what we said there. The spoliation of Church property forms an old and oft-recurring chapter in the annals of secular and ecclesiastical history from the time of the Merovingians to the wholesale secularization of churches and monasteries towards the end of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth century. The cupidity of men is insatiable, but its exercise against the Church has ever been followed by visible, though perhaps slow, punishment, inflicted either on individuals or on whole nations. The law inflicts a severe punishment (1°) on those who, either personally or through others, dare to appropriate to their own use and usurp ecclesiastical property of whatever kind, be it movable or immovable, corporeal or incorporeal and (2°) upon those who dare to prevent either individual or corporate ecclesiastical persons from receiving the fruits or income due to them.

1. The first class is that of convertentes and usurpantes. The text is essentially a repetition of the Tridentine[1]

1 Trid., Sess. 22, c. 11: "Si quem clericorum vel laicorum . . . bona, census ac iura . . . fructus, emolumenta, seu quascumque obventiones, quae in ministrorum et pauperum necessitates converti debent, per se vel alios, vi vel timore incusso, seu etiam per suppositas personas clericorum aut laicorum, seu quacumque arte aut quocumque quaesito

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

anathema against the unrightful holders of ecclesiastical property. We should expect that usurpation would be mentioned first and then appropriation; for usurpare means to occupy something as owner after having taken it away from the real proprietor. But the Council reverses the order, thus intimating that convertere and usurpare constitute one juridical act or criminal deed. This, indeed, appears to be the meaning of the Tridentine text, which emphasizes the alienation of ecclesiastical property from its real purpose. This may be embezzlement proper, or secularization, i. e., turning ecclesiastical property to profane or worldly uses. Embezzlement is committed by a servant or employee. Hence it is clearly stated that only clerics may be guilty of this crime. Secularization is proper to lay persons, especially the powerful and influential, who appropriate church goods to their own use.[2]

Whether this act of unlawful appropriation be committed by the usurpers themselves or through others, is immaterial. Therefore the mandantes are here concerned, who act through others.[3] Per alios may have another meaning. Take this case, for instance: A buys from B a piece of church property, which B had purchased at an auction from the government that had robbed a religious community, but turned the misappropriated property to public, not private, uses. Has A incurred the censure? Yes, answered the Holy Office.[4] Since these cases are not rare, it may be of colore in proprios usus convertere, illosque usurpare praesumpserit, seu impedire, ne ab iis ad quos iure pertinent, percipiantur, is anathemati tamdiu subjaceat. . . ."

2 See D'Annibale, l. c., p. 60, n. 91; Gallemart, Conc. Trid., 1780, II, 654; Hollweck, l. c., p. 238 takes usurpantes and convertentes as distinct terms.

3 But not the consulentes.

4 S. O., July 8, 1874 (Coll. P. F., n. 1420).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google interest to state the practice of the S. Poenitentiaria.[5] Its decisions turn about municipal authorities, mayors, and aldermen and naturally concern a country where wholesale spoliation of religious communities had taken place. The substance of these decisions is:

a) As long as these authorities do not appropriate such property to their own uses, they do not incur the censure, no matter how they may have coöperated in the unjust spoliation. Neither do those incur the censure who freely receive such property through the "liquidateur."

b) Such authorities, mayor, aldermen, etc., are bound to make restitution singillatim, i. e., each one for himself; as to the liquidators, it is not quite certain whether they are obliged to restitution.

c) Those who buy confiscated property and turn it to their own use, incur the censure;

d) With the exception of the last-named class (c) the confessor should not regard the aforesaid persons as public sinners;

e) Concerning the ecclesiastical burial of such persons, the local Ordinary must judge in each individual case.

f) The buyers (emptores) of church property illegitimately confiscated are bound to make restitution, but may easily obtain a "composition" or agreement with the Ordinary or Apostolic Delegate, who receive special faculties to this effect from the S. Poenitentiaria.

A kind of embezzlement no doubt forbidden under censure is keeping back, or occupying and retaining, money

[5] Jan. 3, 1906; March 8, 1906; May 9, 1906; June 7, 1906; Sept. 17, 1906 (Anal. Eccl., XV, 128 ff.) Apostolic Delegates enjoy the faculties to absolve in such cases (Index Facult., n. 9).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and property belonging to the Holy Land, provided, of course, it is turned to one's own use.[6]

Clerics of every rank incur the censure if they misappropriate money or property destined for the maintenance of divine worship or the support of ministers.[7]

Bona ecclesiastica are defined in can. 1497 as such as pertain either to the universal Church, or to the Apostolic See, or to another artificial person, i. e., ecclesiastical corporation, or which are under ecclesiastical ownership and control. This property may be movable (precious and sacred things), or immovable (such as lands). It may be corporeal or incorporeal. The former term comprises all goods which can be seen and handled, whilst incorporeal property is that which cannot be seen as such, for instance, leases, patent rights, literary or copyrights, incorporeal hereditaments.[8] An incorporeal property would also be the secret of manufacturing a certain trade article. All these properties, provided they belong to an ecclesiastical corporation or entity, are here included. It is not quite correct[9] to say that loca pia do not fall under this category. For such institutions (hospitals, orphanages, homes for the aged, the poor, etc.), if erected by the local Ordinary as a juridical person,[10] are ecclesiastical entities and the present canon applies to them.

2. The next class of fraudulent detainers of church property are the impedientes (see can. 2333), viz.:

6 S. O., June 28, 1876 (Coll. P. F., n. 1457.)

7 Wernz, l. c., VI, n. 336, p. 333. The amount required to incur the censure would certainly have to be considerable, $100 or $200; see Hollweck, p. 156, note 18. Thieves and robbers do not incur the censure under this heading; Pennacchi, l. c., II, 368; but may be punished according to can. 2325.

8 Blackstone-Cooley, l. c., II, 16; bonds and stocks rather belong to corporal property.

9 Thus Hilarius a Sexten, l. c., p. 142.

10 Can. 1487, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

those who authoritatively and effectively prevent others from coming into their own. When we say "authoritatively" we do not, however, mean to imply that only public authority in the strict sense is to be understood. Our church trustees, e. g., are not public authorities in the strict sense, but only representatives of private corporations, yet they exercise a certain authority and may, therefore, really "impede." The preventing may be done by threats, violence, sequestration, suspension of payment, lawsuits,[11] etc.

Fructus seu reditus are natural products, such as the tithes from animals, land, trees, etc., formerly paid to the clergy or the Church. Reditus refers particularly to revenues or salaries, such as the income from a benefice. Not comprised under this name or canon are the stole fees and the so-called incerti, i. e., fees for dispensations, expediting documents, etc.[12] For these are especially mentioned under can. 2349.

But these fruits and revenues must belong iure to ecclesiastical persons. The legal title to them is established by the fact that one is a duly appointed minister of an ecclesiastical corporation and has not forfeited his right by illegal acts punishable in law by temporary or perpetual suspension or privation of one's benefice.

3. The penalty is

a) Excommunication latae sententiae, reserved to the Apostolic See until full restitution has been made, the impediment removed, and absolution imparted.

Since, as stated above, compensation or agreement is easily admitted, it is evident that such an act would 11 Hollweck, l. c., p. 237, note 16. To this class belong also advowson and governmental retention of salaries.

12 Can. 463, § 1; can. 1507.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google entitle one to absolution, provided the confessor has the necessary faculties.

b) The patron of a church or property who is guilty of acts forbidden by this canon, is, besides, ipso facto deprived of the ius patronatus, and his church or benefice becomes one of free appointment.

c) A cleric who has committed the crime here mentioned or[13] (by effective confiscation or detention) has consented to the same, must be deprived of all his benefices and declared incapable of obtaining any benefice in future. Besides, he must be suspended from the exercise of his orders for a period to be determined by his Ordinary, even after he has given full satisfaction and obtained absolution. All these clerical penalties, with the exception of excommunication, are now ferendae sententiae, and therefore require the usual admonition and sentence.

"Ausus fuerit" (can. 2229, § 2) implies knowledge that the property was an ecclesiastical one, and also free-will. Therefore, can. 2229, §2 must be consulted.

ILLEGAL ALIENATION

Can. 2347

Firma nullitate actus et obligatione, etiam per censuram urgenda, restituendi bona illegitime acquisita ac reparandi damna forte illata, qui bona ecclesiastica alienare praesumpserit aut in iis alienandis consensum praebere contra praescripta can. 534, § 1, et can. 1532:

1°. Si agatur de re cuius pretium non excedit mille

[13] The cleric, in virtue of his office, is obliged to protect the church property entrusted to him; a protest from him would be sufficient to render him immune from penalty; Hollweck, l. c., p. 239, note 23.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

libellas, congruis poenis a legitimo Superiore ecclesiastico puniatur;

2°. Si agatur de re cuius pretium sit supra mille, sed infra triginta millia libellarum, privetur patronus iure patronatus; administrator, munere administratoris; Superior vel oeconomus religiosus, proprio officio et habilitate ad cetera officia, praeter alias congruas poenas a Superioribus infligendas; Ordinarius vero aliique clerici, officium, beneficium, dignitatem, munus in Ecclesia obtinentes, solvant duplum favore ecclesiae vel piae causae laesae; ceteri clerici suspendantur ad tempus ab Ordinario definiendum;

3°. Quod si beneplacitum apostolicum, in memoratis canonibus praescriptum, fuerit scienter praetermissum, omnes quovis modo reos sive dando sive recipiendo sive consensum praebendo, manet praeterea excommunicatio latae sententiae nemini reservata.

Alienation has been explained elsewhere.[1] Here the penalties are set forth. Those who alienate church property, or consent to such alienation, despite the law laid down in can. 534, § 1 and can. 1532:

1°. Must be fittingly punished by the lawful ecclesiastical superior, if the value of the alienated property does not exceed 1000 francs (lire);

2°. If the value exceeds 1000 francs, but does not reach 30,000:

a) The patron must be deprived of the ius patronatus;

b) The administrator must be removed from his office;

c) The religious superior or oeconomus (procurator) must be deprived of his office and declared incapable of holding any other office, and may also be otherwise punished by his superiors in proportion to his guilt;

1 See can. 534, 1530–1533 (Vol. III and VI of this Commentary).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

d) The Ordinary and other clerics who hold an office, benefice, dignity, or charge in the Church, are bound to pay the double amount to the church or charitable institution which they injured by alienation;

e) Other clerics must be suspended for a period to be fixed by the Ordinary.

3°. If, according to the aforesaid canons, the beneplacitum apostolicum was required, but was knowingly neglected, all those guilty of the crime, those who gave and those who received as well as those who merely gave their consent (if this was needed), incur the excommunicatio latae sententiae reserved to no one.

Our canon states that no obligation arises from an illegal alienation because the act is null and void in the internal as well as the external forum. Furthermore, those who acquire church property by illegal alienation, are bound to make restitution and repair the damage sustained by the ecclesiastical owner of the property.

But what about Ordinaries and clergymen (2, d) who have to pay the duplum? There is no doubt that duplum is here to be taken in comparison with the sum illegally alienated. Therefore, if 20,000 francs were illegally alienated, the Ordinaries guilty of the crime would have to repay 40,000 francs, and if the damage suffered by illegal alienation would not be covered by this latter sum, they would have to pay more.

But who shall enforce these penal laws, since, with the exception of the censure, they are all ferendae sententiae? The immediate superior, and therefore the Apostolic See with regard to autonomous prelates, and the local Ordinary with regard to the inferior clergy.

Attention must be drawn to the terms praesumpserit and scienter praetermissum (consult can. 2229, § 2).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Fear of loss, or deterioration, or real need, or any kind of ignorance would excuse one from the penalties above mentioned.

NEGLECT TO EXECUTE PIOUS BEQUESTS

Can. 2348

Qui legatum vel donationem ad causas pias sive actu inter vivos sive testamento, etiam per fiduciam, obtinuerit et implere negligat, ab Ordinario, etiam per censuram, ad id cogatur.

The Church always insisted upon the strict fulfillment of last wills (can. 1493, 1515) and considered it criminal to delay their execution. Those who retained pious offerings or bequests were cast out of the Church as infidels and called "killers of the poor" (necatores pauperum).[1] Our canon rehearses, though in a milder form, the ancient legislation by providing that those who have received a legacy or donation for a pious cause, or a fiduciary bequest, be it inter vivos or by last will, and neglect to fulfill or execute it, should be compelled to do so, if necessary, even by censures. One penalty mentioned in the Decretals is privation of the executorship and loss of every interest and commission accruing from such an office. But a canonical warning must precede. Another penalty is the use of censures, which also requires a canonical admonition.[2] The time within which the bequest must be executed or liquidated, is one year from the date of the last will or testament becoming known, or, as we would say, probated. This law concerns, as the sources clearly state, the secular as well as the

1 C. 9, 11, C. 13, q. 2.

2 Cc. 3, 6, 17, X, III, 26.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google regular clergy.[3] Of course, as far as formalities are concerned, the civil law must be obeyed. But if that law would confiscate or forbid bequests for church purposes, the heirs would nevertheless be bound in conscience to do what they could to comply with the will of the testator.

REFUSAL TO PAY STOLE FEES AND TAXES

Can. 2349

Recusantes praestationes legitime debitas ad normam can. 463, § 1, 1507, prudenti arbitrio Ordinarii puniantur, donec satisfecerint.

Whilst it would be simony to demand a temporal remuneration for the administration of the Sacraments, as such, yet the legitimacy of stole fees for the support of the ministers has always been upheld by the Church, and the custom of paying such fees has been called praiseworthy.[1] Can. 2349 says these stole fees (for baptisms, marriages, funerals) and the taxes due according to law for civil or voluntary jurisdiction and execution of Apostolic rescripts must be paid by the faithful. Those who refuse to pay may be punished by the local Ordinary until they comply with their obligation. Of course, to those unable to pay, the sacred ministry must be rendered free of charge (can. 463, § 4).

3 Thesaurus-Giraldi, P. II, s. v. "Testamenta," ed. cit., p. 423 f.).

1 See c. 42, X, V, 3. Some refused to pay on account of heretical tendencies, most probably the Petrobrusians and followers of Arnold of Brescia.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XIV

CRIMES AGAINST LIFE, LIBERTY, PROPERTY, GOOD NAME

ABORTION AND SUICIDE

Can. 2350

§ 1. Procurantes abortum, matre non excepta, incurrunt, effectu secuto, in excommunicationem latae sententiae Ordinario reservatam; et si sint clerici, praeterea deponantur.

§ 2. Qui in seipsos manus intulerint, si quidem mors secuta sit, sepultura ecclesiastica priventur ad normam can. 1240, § 1, n. 3; secus, arceantur ab actibus legitimis ecclesiasticis et, si sint clerici, suspendantur ad tempus ab Ordinario definiendum, et a beneficiis aut officiis curam animarum interni vel externi fori adnexam habentibus removeantur.

This canon comprises two criminal acts, both related to homicide, viz.: abortion and suicide.

1. Abortion was widespread among the Greeks and Romans of pagan antiquity. The Christian Church treated it severely.[1] The Roman Law condemned persons of the lower ranks of society who committed abortion to the metalla, i. e., the fiscal mines, and those of higher rank to exile.[2] The ecclesiastical law up to the sixteenth

1 See Eschbach, Disquisitiones Physiologico-Theologicae, 1901, p. 277 ff. The synods of Elvira, Ancyra, etc., mention infanticide, which is identical with abortion in the popular sense.

2 L. 8, Dig. 48, 8; l. 38, § 5, Dig. 48, 19: "Qui abortionis aut

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

century classified abortion with homicide.[3] A decisive step in the penal legislation concerning this offense was taken by Sixtus V, in his Constitution "Effraenatum," Oct. 29, 1588, which was modified considerably by Gregory XIV in his Constitution, "Sedes Apostolica," May 31, 1691. Sixtus V had inflicted the excommunication reserved to the Apostolic See, made no distinction between foetus animatus and inanimatus, formis or informis, and included all accomplices. Gregory XIV reserved the excommunication to the bishop, and restricted the crime to foetus animatus. This was the law of the Church until 1869, when the "Apostolicae Sedis"[4] was issued by Pius IX, which made no distinction between foetus animatus and inanimatus, whilst, on the other hand, it condemned only the procurantes and reserved the censure to the Ordinary.

But the question whether the mother was included was left undecided and opinions continued divided on this point. Our text settles this question by saying: Those who procure abortion,— the mother not excepted, — after the effect has followed, incur the excommunication latae sententiae, reserved to the Ordinary; clerics must, besides, be deposed. This text is identical with that of the "Apostolicae Sedis" except as to the clause: "matre non excepta," and in that it makes the penalty for clerics ferendae sententiae.

1. Now, what is abortion? Authors differ in defining this crime. We accept the following definition: Abortion is the expulsion of a human fetus from the womb amatorium poculum dant, etsi dolo non faciant, tamen qui mali exempli iis est, humiliores in metallum, honestiores in insulam amissa parte bonorum relegentur." The woman is expressly mentioned in l. 8, l. c.

3 C. 20, C. 2, q. 5; c. 8, C. 32, q. 2; cc. 5, 20, X, V, 12.

4 § III, n. 2; "Procurantes abortum, effectu sequuto."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

before it is capable of living separately.[5] This supposes the existence of a human fetus, from the time it can really be called a fetus, to about the seventh month of pregnancy. For after the seventh and up to the ninth month the act of bringing forth a fetus is styled premature birth, not abortion proper, because the fetus at that stage has viability, even though it be precarious. But fetus may also mean the embryonic stage of development from the time of conception to about the sixth week of pregnancy.[6]

The distinction between foetus animatus and inanimatus had been given up since the "Apostolicae Sedis" with regard to censure, but not as to vindictive penalties, and especially irregularity. Yet even now it is safely held and taught that ejection of the semen immediately after the copula does not fall under censure, because conception is not as yet certain. Neither would the ejection of so-called molae (false conceptions) be subject to censure, even though these were ejected with the intention of procuring abortion. As a general rule it may be stated that any act committed within twenty-four hours of conception is not to be construed as abortion, even though done with that intention.[7]

Abortion is called accidental when it is brought about involuntarily, in consequence of a fall, overexertion, or natural dislocation. It is criminal when induced voluntarily for selfish reasons and by forbidden means. It is artificial when induced for medical-therapeutic reasons. But the latter species may be criminal according to sound

5 See Encyclopedia Americana, 1920, I, 45; also Eschbach, l. c., p. 274; Pennacchi, II, 34.

6 See Vol. IV of this Commentary, p. 50 f.

7 Hilarius a Sexten, l. c., p. 218; Hollweck. l. c., p. 252, note 8. The consequence is that syringing after the copula, though perhaps done with criminal intent, does not fall under censure.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google moral principles,[8] and hence the above division is not fully adequate.

2. The different kinds of abortion must be judged by the act that produces abortion. This is called procuratio and its agents procurantes. To procure an abortion means to bring it about purposely and intentionally.[9] This may be done in a twofold way: (a) by seeking abortion directly and for its own sake, in which case it is purely and simply criminal, or (b) as a means to a higher end, for instance, to preserve the life of the mother. In both cases abortion is sought and intended directly as a means to an end.

Mandantes are those who order an abortion to be committed and in whose name it is perpetrated, for instance, the mother who commands the physician to perform an operation the direct effect of which is abortion; or the father or seducer, provided, of course, the woman consents; for it is she who has to give the final permission — always provided she is in a physically and mentally normal condition. The mandantes are without doubt to be reckoned among the procurantes.[10]

Whether the mandatarius, i. e., he who executes the order or command, must be classed with the procurantes, is a controverted question. The executor of the will or command of another does not act in his own name, although, as one commentator most justly observes in our case, he truly and properly procures abortion.[11] We say

8 Encyclopedia Americana, l. c; Eschbach, l. c., p. 274 ff. distinguishes an involuntary or casual and a voluntary abortion; this from a theological viewpoint. Hollweck, l. c., says: directly philosophical and only indirectly physiological.

9 Procurare est studiose et ex industria aliquid quaerere; Pennacchi, II, 34; D'Annibale, l. c., n. 159.

10 Pennacchi, l. c., II, 36; D'Annibale, l. c., p. 103, n. 161; Hollweck, l. c., note 6.— Misleading is the superficial statement: "Some deny it" (Ayrinhac, l. c., p. 288).

11 La Nouvelle Revue Théolo-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the question is controverted, because such well-known commentators on the "Apostolicae Sedis" as Pennacchi [12] and D'Annibale [13] deny that the mandatarius incurs the censure. Therefore the benefit of a real doubt may safely be granted to such, thereby exempting them from the censure.

Those who advise or favor abortion, and druggists or physicians who prepare drugs conducive to abortion, do not incur excommunication. The same is true of those who beat a pregnant woman for any other motive except that of procuring abortion.[14]

3. Effecto secuto means that the attempt must be effective. Whether the effect (abortion) is procured by means of drugs or instruments, or by burdens imposed on the pregnant woman does not matter.[15] A moral cause, for instance, voluntary fright or fear intentionally brought to bear upon a woman, may produce an abortion. But there must always be a causal connection between the means used and the effect intended. Hence if an abortion were produced by a fall, or a scare, or by sickness, even though the woman had taken a drug to insure it, the censure would not be incurred. If it is doubtful what caused abortion, the fall, etc., or the drug, some authors deny [16] that the censure is incurred, while others [17] assert that it is.

These few comments may suffice to disperse at least some doubts. The principal fact to be kept in mind is that the mother is no longer exempt from incurring the gique, Vol. XI, n. 350, quoted by Pennacchi, II, 36.

12 L. c.

13 L. c.; see also Hilarius a Sexten, l. c., p. 219 f.

14 Pennacchi, l. c., p. 35.

15 Sixtus V, "Effraenatum," § 2; D'Annibale, l. c., p. 102, n. 159.

16 D'Annibale, l. c., p. 102, n. 160; Hilarius a Sexten, l. c., p. 220.

17 Lehmkuhl, l. c., II, n. 970. The state of doubt permits can. 209 to be applied.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google censure. She may, however, be immune from censure, if can. 2205, § 2 is verified. For grave fear would render her immune from censure, inasmuch as a censure is a purely ecclesiastical penalty.

Now a brief remark concerning artificial abortion. It has become almost a dogma among authors [18] that craniotomy and embryotomy, though grievously unlawful and forbidden, do not fall under the censure of can. 2350. Craniotomy consists in crushing the fetus and taking it out piecemeal. Another kind of artificial abortion is called medical and consists in the expulsion of an immature fetus on account of a too narrow pelvis. All authors hold as theologically certain that it is never allowed to procure or intend an abortion as such (uti finis) or as means to an end, for instance, to preserve the life of the mother, if the means cause abortion directly (per se) and cannot preserve the life of the mother except by causing abortion.[19] Two, or rather three, decisions of the Holy Office confirm this view: "It cannot be safely taught in Catholic schools," says one of them, "that any kind of surgical operation is allowed which will directly kill the fetus; even if acceleration of birth is not possible on account of the narrowness of the female organs, it is never allowed to cause or provoke an abortion." [20] But where is the censure? We answer: If the physician performs the operation of his own accord, without being commanded or asked by those concerned, he certainly incurs excommunication.[21] But if he merely acts as mandatarius, he does not incur the censure.

18 Hilarius a Sexten, l. c., p. 218 calls it fere communis theologorum sententia.

19 Eschbach, l. c., p. 390 ff.; Coppens, Moral Principles and Medical Practice, 1897, p. 65 ff.

20 S. O., May 28, 1884; July 24, 1895; May 4, 1898 (Coll. P. F., nn. 1618, 1906, 1997).

21 Thus also Eichmann, l. c., p. 176.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

II. Suicide. Those who deliberately commit suicide, are to be deprived of ecclesiastical burial, according to can. 1240, § 1, n. 3, where the necessary remarks have been made on funerals. Those who command the ecclesiastical burial of a suicide do not incur excommunication, because they are not mentioned in can. 2339. If there is doubt whether a suicide was accidental or deliberate, the former is to be presumed. But if there is doubt whether the suicide was committed with deliberation or in the state of mental aberration, malice or intentional suicide should be presumed, according to can. 2200, § 2. However, the statement of a physician or of relatives as to the physical condition of the deceased may safely be accepted. [22]

If one who attempts to commit suicide survives, he must be denied all legal ecclesiastical acts (can. 2256, n. 2). Clerics guilty of such an attempt must be suspended for a period to be fixed by the Ordinary, and, besides, must be removed from any benefice or office connected with the care of souls, both in the internal and external forum. Therefore such clerics, after a declaratory sentence issued by the Ordinary, can no longer function as chaplains, confessors, assistants or curates, pastors or Ordinaries.

DUELLING

Can. 2351

§ 1. Servato praescripto can. 1240, § 1, n. 4, duellum perpetrantes aut simpliciter ad illud provocantes vel ipsum acceptantes vel quamlibet operam aut favorem

22 See Hollweck, l. c., p. 253, note 2; Eichmann, l. c., p. 177. The same is true if the suicide gave signs of repentance before dying; can. 1240, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

praebentes, nec non de industria spectantes illudque permittentes vel quantum in ipsis est non prohibentes, cuiuscunque dignitatis sint, subsunt ipso facto excommunicationi Sedi Apostolicae simpliciter reservatae.

§2. Ipsi vero duellantes et qui eorum patrini vocantur, sunt praeterea ipso facto infames.

A duel is a combat with deadly weapons, without or with fatal result, between two persons who have deliberately agreed on the conditions of the fight.[1] A duel is private if it takes place by private agreement between the parties and their friends: public, if sanctioned by the lawful authority for a public purpose. The purpose may render it lawful or unlawful. If the purpose is a good one, as the prevention of an impending war, for instance, the duel could not be styled unlawful. If held only to satisfy public curiosity, however, like the gladiatorial combats of the Romans, it is wrong and forbidden.

Here we are concerned with private duels.[2] Our text, in terms almost identical with that of "Apostolicae Sedis," subjects to ipso facto excommunication, simply reserved to the Apostolic See, the following persons:

1. Those who participate in a duel, i. e., a single combat fought according to rules laid down by private agreement as to time, place, and weapons, no matter whether the intended result is fatal or not. Therefore, the so-called Mensuren of students and officers are included.[3]

1 Hill, Ethics, ed. 8, p. 210 — except the clause, "with or without fatal result," which had to be added on account of the so-called Mensuren.

2 Public duels are no longer in vogue.

3 § III, 3. Duellum perpetrantes aut simpliciter ad illud provocantes, vel ipsum acceptantes, et quoslibet complices, vel qualemcumque operam aut favorem praebentes, nec non de industria spectantes, illudque permittentes, vel quantum in illis est, non prohibentes, cuiuscumque dignitatis sint, etiam regalis vel imperialis.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2. Those who challenge others to a duel, as just described, no matter whether the duel takes place or not or whether the challenge was accepted or not, provided only it was meant seriously.[4]

3. Those who accept a challenge thus issued.

4. Those who offer any assistance or favor to duellists, for instance, by acting as seconds, witnesses, physicians,[5] and those who rent a place, or carriage, or automobile for that purpose.

5. Those who purposely witness a duel as spectators. The penalty is not incurred if they merely pass by, or watch the duel from a nearby place, provided they are not hired for that purpose.[6]

6. Those who, no matter of what dignity they be, permit or fail to prevent a duel as far as lies within their power. To this class belong the rulers of peoples, if they can impede duels; the magistrates as individuals, under the same condition; and, we believe, also policemen, if the law prohibits duelling; nay, even private citizens, if they can interfere without serious inconvenience; the latter, however, may easily be excused on account of the odium they might expose themselves to.

Note that the provocantes and acceptantes incur excommunication even though the duel does not take place; whilst the others named in numbers 4 to 6 incur it only if the duel really comes off.[7]

The duellants and their seconds (duellantes et patrini) also incur the infamy of law, and hence contract irregularity with regard to orders (can. 984, n. 5; 985, n.

4 S. C. C., Aug. 9, 1890 (Coll. P. F., n. 1739).

5 If the physician is present by chance, he does not incur the censure, but if he is hired for the purpose, he does; S. O., May 28, 1884 (Coll. cit., n. 1617, ad 1).

6 Ib., ad 2 et 3. No confessor is allowed to be purposely present; ib.

7 D'Annibale, l. c., p. 77; n. 115; Pennacchi, l. c., I, 549 f.; Hollweck, l. c., p. 254 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

5). "Mensuren" are not excepted from this rule.[8]

Lastly, ecclesiastical burial must be denied to those who die in a duel or from a wound received in a single combat, unless they give signs of repentance before they die (can. 1240, § 1). But those who command or extort ecclesiastical burial for duelists do not incur excommunication; but those who would grant such a request freely and of their own accord, would incur the interdict, as per can. 2339.

COMPULSION IN REGARD TO THE CLERICAL OR RELIGIOUS VOCATION

Can. 2352

Excommunicatione nemini reservata ipso facto plectuntur omnes, qualibet etiam dignitate fulgentes, qui quoquo modo cogant sive virum ad statum clericalem amplectendum, sive virum aut mulierem ad religionem ingrediendam vel ad emittendam religiosam professionem tam sollemnem quam simplicem, tam perpetuam quam temporariam.

Excommunication reserved to no one is ipso facto incurred by:

1. All, no matter what their dignity, who in any way compel a man to embrace the clerical state;

2. All who in any way compel a man or a woman to enter the religious state or to make religious profession, be it solemn or simple, perpetual or temporary.

This law, substantially taken from the Council of Trent,[1] guarantees the freedom of clerical and religious vocation.

8 S. C. C., Aug. 9, 1890 (l. c., n. 1739).

1 Sess. 25, c. 18; see Bened. XIV, "Si datam," March 4, 1748.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1. The persons here intended are all Catholics of the male or female sex, parents or strangers, of the highest and lowest civil or ecclesiastical dignity[2] or condition: parents, relatives, pastors, confessors, teachers, chaplains,[3] superiors, superioresses, etc., etc.

2. Cogentes quoquo modo means to compel or force one in any way, directly or indirectly, by threats, reverential fear, compulsion, persuasion, promises, etc., whether these means be used directly or through intermediary persons.[4]

3. The purpose must be to compel the other to choose a state for which he or she has or feels no vocation.

a) The clerical state begins with the first tonsure (can. 108, § 1), and hence the excommunication is incurred when that order is received.

b) The religious state is entered at the beginning of the novitiate, not postulancy, because this latter is not required for clerical organizations, and, besides, only novices enjoy the privileges of religious. To compel any one to make profession of any kind here mentioned, renders one liable to the penalty.

ABDUCTION OF WOMEN

Can. 2353

Qui intuitu matrimonii vel explendae libidinis causa rapuerit mulierem nolentem vi aut dolo, vel mulierem

2 Except Cardinals, on account of can. 2227, § 2.

3 If a chaplain of Sisters preaches to academy girls that the only salvation for them is the convent, he is certainly not far from incurring the censure, and should be removed at once.

4 If a girl is sent to a convent to be educated, there is no harm in that; but if the avowed purpose is to make her a nun against her will, the excommunication is incurred after she has entered.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

minoris aetatis consentientem quidem, sed insciis vel contradicentibus parentibus aut tutoribus, ipso iure exclusus habeatur ab actibus legitimis ecclesiasticis et insuper aliis poenis pro gravitate culpae plectatur.

This and the next four canons deal with crimes mixti fori, i. e., such as fall also within the competency of the lay court and are prosecuted by the same. Exception, of course, should be made of clerics, on account of the privilegium fori.

Any man who abducts a woman against her will, by violence or deceit, either with the intention of marrying her or for the sake of gratifying his sensuality; or who abducts a girl not yet of age, even though she is willing, without the knowledge and against the will of her parents or guardians, is ipso iure excluded from legal ecclesiastical acts (can. 2256, n. 2) and should be punished in proportion to his guilt.

It is evident that this penal enactment, latae sententiae, not only regards abduction (raptus) as an impediment, but abduction in general, the condition being, however, that the abductor be a man. The purpose of the law is to protect the liberty and security of women.

MIXED CRIMES

Can. 2354

§ 1. Laicus qui fuerit legitime damnatus ob delictum homicidii, raptus impuberum alterutrius sexus, venditionis hominis in servitutem vel alium malum finem, usurae, rapinae, furti qualificati vel non qualificati in re valde notabili, incendii vel malitiosae ac valde notabilis rerum destructionis, gravis mutilationis vel vul-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

nerationis vel violentiae, ipso iure exclusus habeatur ab actibus legitimis ecclesiasticis et a quolibet munere, si quod in Ecclesia habeat, firmo onere reparandi damna.

§ 2. Clericus vero qui aliquod delictum commiserit de quibus in § 1, a tribunali ecclesiastico puniatur, pro diversa reatus gravitate, poenitentiis, censuris, privatione officii ac beneficii, dignitatis, et si res ferat, etiam depositione; reus vero homicidii culpabilis degradetur.

1. Laymen are ipso iure excluded from legal ecclesiastical acts and any charge they may hold in the Church, save the obligation of indemnity, if:

a) They have been lawfully condemned for homicide;

b) Or for the abduction of impuberes of either sex;

c) Or for slavery proper or white slavery;

d) Or for usury, as far as punishable by civil law;

e) Or for rapine or violent theft;

f) Or for theft, either qualified (for instance, in churches or public buildings: burglary) or unqualified (fraudulent misappropriation against the will of the owner) [1] in re valde notabili, that is, of a thing of considerable value, either materially or by reason of art or antiquity;

g) Or for arson or malicious destruction of considerable property, either out of a spirit of wanton cruelty or wicked revenge;[2]

h) Or for serious mutilation, wounding, or battery.

2. If a clergyman has committed any of the aforementioned crimes, he must be punished by the ecclesiastical court in proportion to the gravity of his guilt

1 Cfr. Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 220. 2 Ib., p. 163.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google with penances, censures, privation of office and benefice, and, in more serious cases, with deposition; if he is guilty of culpable homicide, he must be degraded.

Note, however, that these penalties are to be meted out only after the culprits have been condemned by a legitimate court, after a trial conducted according to the laws and customs of the country, and after the time for appeal has elapsed.

PRIVATE VERBAL INJURIES

Can. 2355

Si quis non re, sed verbis vel scriptis vel alia quavis ratione iniuriam cuiquam irrogaverit vel eius bonam famam laeserit, non solum potest ad normam can. 1618, 1938 cogi ad debitam satisfactionem praestandam damnaque reparanda, sed praeterea congruis poenis ac poenitentiis puniri, non exclusa, si de clericis agatur et casus ferat, suspensione aut remotione ab officio et beneficio.

Can. 2344 punishes libelous and oral injuries directed against higher dignitaries as public persons. Here these injuries are punished if committed against laymen or clerics by the persons just mentioned. But here a tort is committed, rather than a crime, which in secular law would be prosecuted in the civil, not in the criminal court. Those who inflict (not real but) verbal injuries by *word or writin*g,[1] or in any other way, for instance, by offensive gestures, on anyone, whether a cleric of inferior rank or a layman, or who defame any of the aforesaid persons, may be compelled to give satisfaction[2]

1 To these belong insulting pictures or caricatures.

2 Satisfaction is generally made by offering an apology or inserting

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google and to repair eventual damage, provided the offended party insists upon such punishment, according to can. 1618 (a civil trial) or a denunciation to the fiscal promotor has been made according to can. 1938 (a criminal trial in the ecclesiastical sense).

Besides, other proportionate punishments and penances may be meted out; and if the offenders are clerics, they may, if necessary (for instance, if the scandal or damage was of a very serious nature) also be suspended or removed from office and benefice.

Thus a slanderous cleric, according to the IVth Synod of Carthage, should be made to apologize, and if he demurs, may be degraded.[3] Laymen who slander a priest, orally or in writing should be excommunicated.[4] Laymen who commit the same offence against one of their own class, should be scourged and compelled to do public penance.[5]

The penalties are now fixed by the civil courts. Laymen who wish to bring suit against a cleric in such cases need the permission of the local Ordinary.[6] Prescription for such offences runs one year (v. can. 1703, n. 2).

BIGAMY

Can. 2356

Bigami, idest qui, obstante coniugali vinculo, aliud matrimonium, etsi tantum civile, ut aiunt, attentaverint, sunt ipso facto infames; et si, spreta Ordinarii monitione, in illicito contubernio persistant, pro an article in a specified newspaper.

3 C. 2, Dist. 46.
4 C. 8, C. 5, q. 6.
5 C. 18. C. 5, q. 1.
6 See can. 120; can. 2341.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

diversa reatus gravitate excommunicentur vel personali interdicto plectantur.

1. Bigamists, i. e., persons who, though validly married, attempt another (though perhaps only civil) marriage are infamous by law, and if they spurn a warning given by the Ordinary and continue their unlawful relation, should be punished by excommunication or personal interdict, according to the grievousness of their guilt.

A bigamist, as here understood, is a man who has two or more wives at the same time. Bigamy, therefore, is identical with polygamy. It is punishable only when it is subjective,[1] i. e., when one knows that the former marriage tie was and is still valid and not dissolved in an ecclesiastically legal form. Unfortunately the State sometimes grants a divorce for reasons nugatory in the eyes of the Church, and without regard to her laws.

2. Polygamy is punishable only if a second marriage has been attempted. We say: attempted, not contracted, because the object of the marital contract has not only been promised, but delivered up to another party still living. But there must be a semblance of a second marriage, that is, the culprit must go through a legally recognized marriage ceremony with another person to incur the censure.[2] It is hardly imaginable that a Catholic minister would assist at a marriage without having inquired into the free state of the parties. Therefore, civil marriage is especially mentioned.

3. Equally punishable is the woman who, though free,

1 A man who marries (invalidly) a woman whilst his first wife is still alive, but bona fide believed to be dead, would not commit bigamy subjectively, but objectively; and, therefore, could not be punished as a bigamist in the ecclesiastical court.

2 Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 286 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google marries a bigamist, provided, of course, she knows of the married state of her supposed husband. The individual contract and the attempt against the unity of matrimony in this case require equal punishment.[3]

4. The penalty for bigamy is legal infamy with all its consequences (can. 2294, § 1). Besides, says the text, the seriousness of the guilt should be properly considered. For the rank of the parties (can. 2207, n. 1) may set an exceptionally bad example or cause great scandal.[4] But the severer penalties are to be inflicted only after a warning, which should be a canonical one (can. 2309), because the penalty to be inflicted (ferendae sententiae) is the heaviest, namely, excommunication or the personal interdict.

CRIMES OF LAYMEN AGAINST GOOD MORALS

Can. 2357

§ 1. Laici legitime damnati ob delicta contra sextum cum minoribus infra aetatem sexdecim annorum commissa, vel ob stuprum, sodomiam, incestum, lenocinium, ipso facto infames sunt, praeter alias poenas quas Ordinarius infligendas iudicaverit.

§ 2. Qui publicum adulterii delictum commiserint, vel in concubinatu publice vivant, vel ob alia delicta contra sextum decalogi praeceptum legitime fuerint

3 The secular law would have her indicted for bigamy as a principal in the second degree (ib., p. 291). "It is no defence that the defendant was a member of a religious sect [Mormons of the original type are here meant], which professed to extol polygamy as a virtue, and that he conscientiously believed he was doing no wrong in contracting a plural marriage" (ib., p. 292).

4 Former penalties were excommunication and public penance; c. 19, C. 24, q. 3; cc. 8, 9, C. 32, q. 7; Urban VIII, "Magnum in Christo," June 20, 1637, § 2, condemned bigamists to the galleys or public whipping post and perpetual prison.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

damnati, excludantur ab actibus legitimis ecclesiasticis, donec signa verae resipiscentiae dederint.

§ 1 declares laymen legally infamous and otherwise punishable by the Ordinary:

1. If they have been lawfully convicted of crimes against the sixth commandment committed with minors, i. e., persons of either sex who have not yet completed the sixteenth year of age; or

2. If they have been lawfully condemned for fornication, sodomy, incest, or panderage.

As to the requisites for incurring this penalty, it may be observed that the act must amount to a copula perfecta; actus inconsummati would not constitute the crime,[1] wherefore tactus, oscula, amplexus are not here intended. Minors may be of either sex, whence a coitus viri cum viro would indeed be sodomy, but even more punishable on account of the moral seduction and responsibility involved.[2]

Stuprum is here to be understood as violent fornication, otherwise the text would have employed fornicatio. Properly speaking it is the violent defloration of a woman still a virgin.[3] But common doctrine has accepted it as a violation of any woman, married or single, whose character was not ruined by immoral conduct. However, if we say violent, this term must be understood also of deceit, fraud, threats, and fear.[4]

Sodomia is unnatural sexual gratification by an act committed with a person of the same sex. It also includes bestiality. Not included under this penal law is 1 See Hollweck, l. c., p. 267, note 4.

2 Pius V, "Cum primum," April 1, 1566, § 11; it need not be habitual.

3 Civil law styles it seduction with a widely different definition; Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 294 f.

4 Reiffenstuel, V, 16, n. 43 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sodomia imperfecta or coitus viri cum femina, non servato vase naturali.[5]

Incestus is sexual intercourse between persons related within the degrees of consanguinity or affinity wherein they may not lawfully marry. The former[6] penalty of illicit affinity and loss of marital rights (ius petendi debitum conjugale) is now abolished. The fact of incest or the intention or agreement to commit incest in order more easily to obtain a dispensation need not be mentioned in the petition for the dispensation.[7]

Lenocinium is panderage for filthy lucre's sake, according to the Roman Law, i. e., as a canon of the synod of Elvira (313, n. 3) states, the sale of another person's body for the purpose of unlawful gratification, no matter whether the mother, or the father, or another commits the crime.[8] Hence keepers of houses of ill fame fall under this heading and, therefore, incur infamy (can. 2294, § 1).

§ 2 considers the public crimes of adultery and public concubinage, as also other crimes against the sixth commandment, provided the perpetrators have been lawfully convicted of such crimes or misdemeanors, or whatever else they be styled, in civil law. The latter has not even a clear view of what constitutes adultery.[9] According to ecclesiastical law, adultery is sexual intercourse of a married person with another person than his or her consort.[10] It does not require the copula perfecta and may be committed with a married or a single person.

On concubinage see can. 1078.

The penalty for these crimes is exclusion from legal

5 Schmalzgrueber, V, 16, n. 117.
6 C. 1, X, IV, 13.
7 S. O., June 25, 1885 (Coll. P. F., n. 1635).
8 L. 4, § 2, Dig. 3, 2; Hollweck, l. c., p. 271, note 2.
9 See Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 292 f.
10 "Adulterium est alieni thori violatio"; Gratiani dictum, § 3 ad c. 2, C. 36, q. 1.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ecclesiastical acts as long as no signs of repentance are given.[11] But the penalty is ferendae sententiae, conditioned by a previous civil conviction.

CLERICAL OFFENDERS CONTRA SEXTUM

Can. 2358

Clerici in minoribus ordinibus constituti, rei alicuius delicti contra sextum decalogi praeceptum, pro gravitate culpae puniantur etiam dimissione e statu clericali, si delicti adiuncta id suadeant, praeter poenas de quibus in can. 2357, si his locus sit.

Can. 2359

§ 1. Clerici in sacris sive saeculares sive religiosi concubinarii, monitione inutiliter praemissa, cogantur ab illicito contubernio recedere et scandalum reparare suspensione a divinis, privatione fructuum officii, beneficii, dignitatis, servato praescripto can. 2176-2181.

§ 2. Si delictum admiserint contra sextum decalogi praeceptum cum minoribus infra aetatem sexdecim annorum, vel adulterium, stuprum, bestialitatem, sodomiam, lenocinium, incestum cum consanguineis aut affinibus in primo gradu exercuerint, suspendantur, infames declarentur, quolibet officio, beneficio, dignitate, munere, si quod habeant, priventur, et in casibus gravioribus deponantur.

§ 3. Si aliter contra sextum decalogi praeceptum deliquerint, congruis poenis secundum casus gravitatem coerceantur, non excepta officii vel beneficii privatione, maxime si curam animarum gerant.

11 Whether the signs are sufficient is to be decided by the one who issued the penal sentence in the ecclesiastical court.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

These two canons have one and the same object in view, viz.: to punish more severely the crimes referred to in can. 2357, which are punished gradually, i. e., according to the degree of the clerical state.[1] But what was stated as to consummate acts, by way of explanation of the preceding canon, etc., also applies here.

1. Clerics in minor orders who are proved guilty of an offense against the sixth commandment, are to be punished in proportion to the seriousness of the transgression, even with dismissal from the clerical state if necessary, i. e., if the circumstances demand it; besides, the penalties stated in can. 2357 must be applied if the crime is such as to call for them.

2. Clerics in sacris, i. e., from subdeaconship upward, either secular or religious, who live in concubinage, must first be canonically warned.[2] If the warning proves fruitless, they are to be compelled to give up the unlawful relation and to repair the scandal by suspension a divinis (see can. 2279, § 2, n. 2), privation of the income from office, from benefice, and from dignity. But the procedure stated under can. 2176-2181 must be observed.

3. Clerics in sacris, secular or religious, who have committed a crime against the sixth commandment with a person of either sex who has not completed the sixteenth year, or who have committed adultery, rape, bestiality, sodomy, panderage, incest with blood or legal relatives in the first degree,[3] shall be suspended, declared infamous, deprived of every office, benefice, dignity, and charge they may hold, and, in more serious cases, shall be deposed.[4] All these penalties, though preceptive (see

1 Former penalties: deposition, removal from office, imprisonment in a monastery; see cc. 6, 28, C. 27, q. 1.

2 See can. 2176.

3 That is to say; with mother, daughter, stepmother, stepdaughter, sister, stepsister, sister-in-law.

4 See can. 2278, § 2; 2291, n. 4; 2298, n. 6; 2298, n. 10.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

can. 2223), are ferendae sententiae and, therefore, require a canonical warning (see can. 2233).

4. Clerics in sacris, either secular or religious, who have committed a delinquency contra sextum not mentioned in the preceding two sections, must be punished in proportion to the grievousness of the sin. Such delinquents, especially if they are entrusted with the care of souls, may also be deprived of their office or benefice.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE XV

CRIMEN FALSI OR FORGERY

Under this heading were formerly reckoned not only the crimes mentioned in can. 2360 and 2362, but also forgery of weights, measures, and money, and the substitution of children (suppositio partus alieni).[1] Our text retains only two of the former subjects classed in this category, namely, forgery of papal documents and forgery of ecclesiastical documents and acts. But it adds obreptitious and subreptitious rescripts, and above all the act of falsely accusing a confessor of solicitation in the confessional.

FORGERY OF PAPAL DOCUMENTS

Can. 2360

§ 1. Omnes fabricatores vel falsarii litterarum, decretorum vel rescriptorum Sedis Apostolicae vel iisdem litteris, decretis vel rescriptis scienter utentes incurrunt ipso facto in excommunicationem speciali modo Sedi Apostolicae reservatam.

§ 2. Clerici delictum de quo in § 1 committentes aliis poenis praeterea coerceantur, quae usque ad privationem beneficii, officii, dignitatis et pensionis ecclesiasticae extendi possunt; religiosi autem priventur omnibus officiis quae in religione habent et voce activa

1 See the commentators on X, V, 20, de crimine falsi.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ac passiva, praeter alias poenas in propriis cuiusque constitutionibus statutas.

The canon mentions three classes of criminal tamperers with official documents of the Apostolic See.

1. Fabricatores are forgers. To forge a document means to make a false imitation of it. The document may be drawn from pre-existing material, as, for instance, the Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals. The idea of forgery in the strict sense embraces the document as a whole; a document is a forgery when it purports to be what it is not; or, in other words, when it not only tells a lie, but tells a lie about itself.[2] That such a document cannot be called genuine, is evident. It is the task of diplomatics — as this art is called since the time of Mabillon — to determine the genuineness of documents. In the Middle Ages the seal appended to or impressed upon a diploma was considered a decisive proof of its genuineness.[3]

2. Falsarii are those who partly forge a document by interpolating, changing or correcting it [4] with the intention of defrauding (cum dolo et jactura). Our canon does not exclude this malicious intention, for there can be no reasonable doubt that falsarii is used here in the same sense as in the "Apostolicae Sedis," [5] where the commentators

2 Kenny-Webb, l. c., p. 240.

3 Bresslau, Urkundenlehre, 1889, p. 5 ff. The diplomaticists distinguish internal and external marks of genuineness.

4 Cfr. c. 5, X, V, 20: appending a genuine bull or seal to false documents, changing the string of hemp or silk, using erasure, caustics, etc.

5 § I, 9. "Omnes falsarios Litterarum Apostolicarum, etiam in forma Brevis ac supplicationum gratiam vel iustitiam concernentium per Romanum Pontificem vel S. R. E. Vice-Cancellarios seu Gerentes vices corum aut ae mandato eiusdem Romani Pontificis signatarum: nec non falso publicantes Litteras Apostolicas, etiam in forma Brevis, et etiam falso signantes supplicationes huiusmodi sub nomine Romani Pontificis, seu Vice-Cancellarii aut Gerentis vices praedictorum."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

unanimously understood it in the sense of intentional fraud. We can hardly imagine that any one would tamper with papal documents just for fun. But the fabricatores, as distinguished from falsifiers, need not have an evil intention. The crime is committed if a false document is made.[6] It is an outrage to public authority, especially since such a document may be passed on to others. Therefore, the penalty is incurred as soon as the document is completely manufactured. As to the falsifiers, a dolus or malicious purpose is certainly required, but it does not matter whether the effect intended is or is not produced.

3. Those who knowingly use (or rather abuse) such forged and falsified documents, are also mentioned. The word uti, to make use of or enjoy, may mean by exhibition or offer either to benefit oneself or another, although the intention may have been frustrated by discovery. But mere reading, although knowingly done, would certainly not constitute the act of "using."

4. The documents here intended are letters, decrees, or rescripts of the Apostolic See,[7] i. e., documents emanating either from the Pope himself or from some department of the Roman Court.

5. The penalty for all fabricators and forgers of papal documents, and those who knowingly use them, is excommunication incurred ipso facto and reserved modo speciali to the Apostolic See.

Clerics, besides incurring this censure, are to be punished otherwise, even with privation of benefice, office, dignity, and ecclesiastical pension. Religious are to be punished with privation of all offices they hold in their institute (including prelacies) and of the active and 6 D'Annibale, l. c., p. 53, n. 81. 7 See can. 7.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google passive vote, besides other penalties established in their constitutions.

SUBREPTITIOUS AND OBREPTITIOUS RESCRIPTS

Can. 2361

Si quis in precibus ad rescriptum a Sede Apostolica vel a loci Ordinario impetrandum fraude vel dolo verum reticuerit aut falsum exposuerit, potest a suo Ordinario pro culpae gravitate puniri, salvo praescripto can. 45, 1054.

Those who fraudulently or deceitfully suppress the truth or state a falsehood in a petition for a rescript addressed to the Apostolic See or the local Ordinary, may be punished by the latter according to the grievousness of their guilt.

However, according to can. 45, all rescripts are now valid, even if some essential point has been suppressed, provided the final or motive cause has been truly stated. And rescripts for matrimonial dispensations are valid even if the motive or final cause has been misrepresented. Thus can. 1054.

The penalty is optional and may therefore be inflicted by the Ordinary according to can. 2223, § 2, or not, as he chooses. The Ordinary qualified to inflict the penalty is the one whose subject has obtained the rescript under false pretences; for religious, their immediate superior.

FORGERY OF OTHER ECCLESIASTICAL DOCUMENTS

Can. 2362

Litterarum vel actorum ecclesiasticorum tam publi-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

corum quam privatorum fabricatores vel falsarii vel huiusmodi documentis scienter utentes, pro gravitate delicti coerceantur, firmo praescripto can. 2406, § 1.

Those who forge or falsify ecclesiastical letters or acts, either public or private, as well as those who knowingly make use of such spurious documents, shall be punished proportionately to the seriousness of their crime. Those who are charged with compiling, writing or keeping official acts shall, in case such acts are criminally tampered with, be punished according to can. 2406, § 1.

Can. 1813 defines the term public ecclesiastical documents. They are: acts of Ordinaries,— for instance appointments and regulations emanating from the diocesan chancery, instruments drawn up by an ecclesiastical notary, judiciary acts of every kind pertaining to ecclesiastical courts, the different parochial books, etc.

Private documents: private letters, contracts or deeds, or abstracts thereof, legacies and bequests, as far as they pertain to ecclesiastical persons as such, not as private persons.

The penalty is obligatory, but arbitrary and proportionate, inasmuch as it is left to the Ordinary (or superior of exempt religious), who must weigh the importance of the document, the condition of the delinquent, and the damage caused by the criminal act. Formerly the punishment was deposition, i. e., reduction to the lay state, and perpetual penance in a monastery, for bishops as well as clerics of lower rank.[1]

1 See c. 7, Dist. 50. Ecclesiastical corporations as well as individuals were guilty of such unqualified acts; see Bresslau, l. c., p. 972 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

FALSE ACCUSATION OF SOLICITATION

Can. 2363

Si quis per seipsum vel per alios confessarium de sollicitationis crimine apud Superiores falso denuntiaverit, ipso facto incurrit in excommunicationem speciali modo Sedi Apostolicae reservatam, a qua nequit ullo in casu absolvi, nisi falsam denuntiationem formaliter retractaverit, et damna, si qua inde secuta sint, pro viribus reparaverit, imposita insuper gravi ac diuturna poenitentia, firmo praescripto can. 894.

One who either himself or through others falsely accuses a confessor of the crime of solicitation to his superiors —

1. Incurs ipso facto the excommunication reserved to the Apostolic See modo speciali,

2. From which he can in no case be absolved, unless

3. He has formally retracted the slanderous denunciation, and

4. Has repaired, as far as possible, the damage caused by his act.

Besides a grave and lasting penance must be imposed on him, and canon 894 be duly observed.

What solicitation is has been explained under can. 894. It is provocatio ad turpia in the act or under the species of sacramental confession.[1]

a) The denunciation must be made judiciarily, i. e., either to the Holy Office or to the Ordinary, and must be effective,[2] i. e., be accepted as a means of prosecution.

1 See Vol. IV of our Commentary, p. 318 f.

2 Hollweck, l. c., p. 280, note 4.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The effect is assured when the summons is issued to the accused or to the witnesses.

A false denunciation is one based on (at least subjective) untruth. Falsity always supposes prevarication of the truth, done with malice (dolus). However, it may happen that a penitent has misunderstood a question put to him by the confessor and construed it as a solicitation. In this case the malice or subjective untruth would be wanting. The confessor might be an innocent victim until the prosecution cleared up the mistake.

Denunciation may be made by the penitent himself for any motive, — hatred, anger, revenge, etc. — or through others, by means of impious advice, promises, flattery, threats, or even ambiguous insinuations.

b) The censure can in no case be absolved from unless the conditions mentioned are complied with; hence neither in the case of danger of death — which was excepted by Benedict XIV in the Constitution quoted below [3] — nor in the cases mentioned under can. 2254.[4] The condition next mentioned is

c) Formal retraction, which is to be made to the same authorities before whom the accusation was brought, and in a judiciary way. If this is impossible on account of the physical or mental condition of the culprit, the confessor may receive the retraction, absolve the penitent (immediately if required), and then report to the authorities.

The other condition of repairing the damage has tractum temporis, and therefore, in case of urgent necessity, a serious promise may be accepted.

The question may here be asked: Would the ab-

3 Bened. XIV, "Sacramentum poenitentiae," June 1, 1741, § 3.

4 This seems to be implied by the term nequit in ullo casu, although not especially mentioned in can. 2254, § 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

solution be valid if no formal retraction had been made? Provided the priest had the necessary faculty, or the circumstance was one mentioned in can. 2252 or 2254, we believe that the absolution would be valid. For the nequit can just as well be referred to illicit absolution, and therefore the minimum must be assumed. Besides, retraction and reparation certainly cannot be made at the moment of confession. Consequently, we would have to say that absolution would be valid only after the reparation was made, which would hardly be admitted by theologians. As to the gravity and duration of the penance, the general rules given by moralists may be consulted.[5]

A last remark, inspired by some magazine articles,[6] may be permitted. The sin mentioned here is reserved, not only by reason of the censure attached, but on its own account (ratione sui), and it is the only one thus reserved. This is reservation pure and simple, or limitation of jurisdiction, which requires only the necessary matter and that the persons be subject to the power of jurisdiction. Since the sin as such is reserved, and is supposed to be complete in genere suo, it follows that a person by committing this sin is withdrawn from the jurisdiction of any one inferior to the Pope, and consequently neither ignorance nor doubt can excuse the delinquent.

Arregui (Summarium Theol. Moralis, 1919, ed. 4, n. 607, note 2, p. 388) insists on the wording of the "Sacramentum Poenitentiae," which says, "ut tam detestabile facinus metu magnitudinis poenae coerceatur." But does the finis legis fall under the law itself? The "ut finale" would indeed have weight if the context were not contradictory.

5 Hearing Mass, Litany of All Saints, five decades of the Rosary, are grave penances; Lehmkuhl, II, n. 357.

6 See Eccl. Review, Vol. 59, p. 458 ff.; Vol. 60, p. 61 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Here we may add another observation provoked by some writers (see Eccl. Review, 1921, May, Sept., Nov.). The controversy concerns the extent to which the "periculum gravis scandali vel infamiae" may be stretched. Can. 2254, § 1, where this phrase occurs, has reference to a rather urgent case, casus urgentior. An objectively light reason would hardly be acknowledged as sufficient to absolve from censure. For the matter of censure is a serious one, and the confessor is therefore obliged in conscience not to make light of it. However, the confessor is judge and physician in the confessional and minister of God's justice and mercy (Can. 888, § 1). Therefore he is entitled to use his own judgment in the matter of absolution. He must consider the grievous faults and the serious penalty on the one hand, and the welfare of the penitent on the other. But the welfare of the individual must cede to the welfare of society. Hence, when the public weal would be jeopardized, human respect or the consideration of private benefit must give way. Therefore, when a notorious violation of a penal law is involved, we cannot convince ourselves of the permissibility of absolving for a light reason, such as devotional or even society communion would be. But when the transgression is not a notorious violation, and the public welfare not in danger, we do believe that any plausible reason which appears such to the confessor is sufficient.— The interpretation of "quoquo modo," in can. 899, § 3, as if this could mean "for examples, in synodo aut extra synodum," sounds to us very improbable. For can. 895 tells the Ordinary the conditions or methods he should observe in reserving cases; but this produces no effect on reservation itself. And the "quoquo modo" concerns the mode of reserving which is twofold: under sin only, or under censure.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XVI

UNLAWFUL ADMINISTRATION AND RECEPTION OF ORDERS AND OTHER SACRAMENTS

Two Sacraments are especially protected by penal sanctions: Penance and Orders. Extreme Unction is not mentioned, though formerly religious were forbidden under censure to administer it.[1] Four canons of this Title refer to the Sacrament of Penance, five canons to Orders, and one each to Confirmation and Matrimony. The first canon is devoted to the administration of the Sacraments in general.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE SACRAMENTS TO PERSONS FORBIDDEN BY LAW TO RECEIVE THEM

Can. 2364

Minister qui ausus fuerit Sacramenta administrare illis qui iure sive divino sive ecclesiastico eadem recipere prohibentur, suspendatur ab administrandis Sacramentis per tempus prudenti Ordinarii arbitrio definiendum aliisque poenis pro gravitate culpae puniatur, firmis peculiaribus poenis in aliqua huius generis delicta iure statutis.

Ministers who dare to administer the Sacraments to such as are forbidden to receive them by either divine or ecclesiastical law, should be suspended by the 1 "Apostolicae Sedis," II, 14.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Ordinary from administering the Sacraments, for a time to be determined by the same Ordinary according to his own judgment, and punished with other penalties according to the gravity of the guilt. Special penalties decreed for specified transgressions of this kind remain untouched.

The administration of a Sacrament is unlawful not only in case of invalid, but also of illicit reception, for the Code does not distinguish, but only states: recipere prohibentur, which may be applied to invalid as well as illicit administration.

The Code states that the prohibition may be dictated either by divine or by ecclesiastical law.

1. The divine law excludes

a) From Baptism those incapable of receiving it according to can. 745, § 1;

b) From the other Sacraments those who are not baptized,[2] as well as heretics and schismatics.[3] Note also can. 968, § 1, according to which only males can be validly ordained.

The ecclesiastical law excludes

a) From any Sacrament all those who are excommunicated and personally interdicted;[4]

b) From Baptism the children of non-baptized parents, and of heretics and schismatics; adults against their own will and amentes;[5]

c) From holy Communion public indigni and those who unlawfully break the natural fast;[6]

d) From Extreme Unction those who, being of the age of reason, are not sick, according to can. 940;

e) From Orders those who are irregular or subject to a simple canonical impediment.[7]

2 See can. 786; 853; 901; 940; 968; 1012, § 2.
3 See can. 731, § 2.
4 Can. 2260, § 1; 2275, n. 2.
5 Can. 750–752, 754.
6 Can. 855, § 1; can. 858.
7 Can. 984, 985, 987.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

As to marriage, observe that the priest merely assists at, but does not administer, the Sacrament of Matrimony, and that, therefore, can. 2364 cannot be applied in this case.

The penalty is both vindictive and preceptive, and accompanied by irregularity if any act of the power of orders is exercised.[8] The text states: firmis peculiaribus poenis, etc. The act of unlawful administration may, besides, have a special penalty attached, by reason of a special circumstance, as in regard to can. 2338, § 3, admitting excommunicated, interdicted, or suspended persons to the reception of the Sacraments.[9] Attention is also drawn to the term, ausus fuerit, which must be understood in the light of can. 2229, § 1-2.

CONFIRMATION ADMINISTERED BY A PRIEST

Can. 2365

Presbyter qui nec a iure nec ex Romani Pontificis concessione facultatem habens sacramentum confirmationis ministrare ausus fuerit, suspendatur; si vero facultatis sibi factae limites praetergredi praesumpserit, eadem facultate eo ipso privatus exsistat.

A priest who, though he is empowered neither by law nor by Apostolic faculty to administer Confirmation, yet dares to administer this Sacrament, must be suspended. If he presumes to overstep the limits of a faculty which he actually possesses, let him be deprived of this faculty ipso iure.

1. Priests empowered by law to administer Confirmation

8 Can. 985, n. 7; 2223; 2298, n. 2. Eichmann, l. c., p. 198.
9 See also can. 2370, 2373, 2375;

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

are all cardinals, abbots nullius, and prelates nullius, vicars and prefects Apostolic.[1]

2. Priests empowered to confirm by an Apostolic privilege or faculty, are those who have obtained this privilege by papal delegation or subdelegation, as stated elsewhere.[2]

If any priest not empowered by law or by a papal faculty should dare (ausus fuerit) [3] to administer Confirmation, he is to be suspended either by his Ordinary or by higher authority. The suspension here worded in general terms must be taken as a general suspension.[4] Besides, if those endowed with the power of administering Confirmation should dare to exceed the territorial or personal limits assigned to them, or to extend it beyond the duration of their office or of the term granted in the indult, they lose the power or faculty.

HEARING CONFESSIONS AND GIVING ABSOLUTION FROM RESERVED SINS WITHOUT JURISDICTION

Can. 2366

Sacerdos qui sine necessaria iurisdictione praesumpserit sacramentales confessiones audire, est ipso facto suspensus a divinis; qui vero a peccatis reservatis absolvere, ipso facto suspensus est ab audiendis confessionibus.

This canon mentions two distinct transgressions:

I. A priest who dares to hear sacramental confessions

1 See can. 782, § 3; it is supposed that these dignitaries have not received episcopal consecration.

2 See Vol. IV of this Commentary, p. 102 f.

3 See can. 2229, § 2.

4 See can. 2278, § 2; see can. 782, § 3, 4, 5: formerly an Oriental or a Ruthenian priest confirming a Latin child was ipso facto suspended; S. C. P. F., Oct. 6, 1863 (Coll., n. 1243).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google without the necessary jurisdiction, is ipso facto suspended a divinis.

1. The culprit is supposed to be a validly ordained priest, not a layman or cleric who has not yet received the priesthood. Of the latter can. 2322, n. 1, treats under crimes against religion.

2. The priest may be either secular or religious, and it matters not what kind of a privilege he may have obtained, provided he hears sacramental confession without being endowed with the necessary (ordinary or delegated) jurisdiction.[1]

3. Concerning exempt religious, if they wish to hear confessions of lay persons or of Sisters with either solemn or simple vows, they need a special faculty or jurisdiction from the local Ordinary in whose diocese the confessions are to be heard.[2]

4. This faculty now required according to can. 879, § 1, must be granted expressly, either in writing or orally.

5. The act must concern sacramental confession according to can. 2322, n. 1. A confession is sacramental also if it involves only venial sins, and hence a simplex sacerdos without jurisdiction or faculties can not hear confessions the matter of which are only venial sins.[3] If the confession was sacramental, it matters not whether absolution was given or not, because the text simply says: to hear sacramental confessions. The same term also occurs in the papal constitutions quoted below.

1 See can. 872, 873, 874, 878, § 1.

2 Ibid.; also Innocent X, "Cum sicut," May 14, 1648, § 3, 4, I, ad 10 (Bull. Luxemb., 1727, t. V, 458 f.). Even the privileges of the Cruciata are of no avail; Bened. XIV, "Apostolica indulta," Aug. 5, 1744, §§ 3, 5.

3 It may appear strange to state this explicitly, but the S. C. C., Feb. 12, 1679 (Coll. P. F., n. 219) had occasion to emphasize it.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

6. The penalty is suspension a divinis incurred ipso facto according to can. 2279, § 2, n. 2. However, note the term praesumpserit, which presupposes that the act was done with full knowledge and deliberation (can. 2229). It might easily happen that a pastor or priest would think that he could hear the confessions of female religious in virtue of his general faculties. If under such an impression he did so, he would not incur the censure. Neither would he incur this penalty if he were in doubt (can. 209), and much less if he would hear the confession of a person in danger of death (can. 882).

II. Priests who dare to absolve from reserved sins are ipso facto suspended from hearing confessions.

1. What was said above 1, 1-4 also applies here.

2. This case supposes that absolution was "attempted," i. e., pronounced by a priest who, though perhaps possessed of ordinary faculties, did not have the special faculty required for absolving from reserved sins.

3. The reservation concerns sins, not censures, these being mentioned under can. 2338, § 1, as a usurpation of authority. To this class, therefore, belong the case mentioned in can. 894 (false accusation of an innocent confessor), and those cases which the local Ordinary may, according to can. 895, reserve to himself. From the latter cases, however, any confessor may absolve according to can. 900. Can. 882 mentions a lawful excuse from incurring the censure.

If superiors of exempt clerical religious have reserved cases to themselves, according to can. 986, their subjects would incur the censure if they absolved from these cases without possessing any other faculty than that granted by their superior. However, if they possess faculties from the local Ordinary, and absolve from sins reserved

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

in their institute, they do not incur the penalty. Neither would secular priests absolving religious from sins reserved in their order incur the penalty, according to can. 519. But confessors, secular or religious, who would absolve female religious from sins reserved by the local Ordinary would incur the penalty, and could be removed from office.[4]

ABSOLUTIO COMPLICIS

Can. 2367

§ 1. Absolvens vel fingens absolvere complicem in peccato turpi incurrit ipso facto in excommunicationem specialissimo modo Sedi Apostolicae reservatam; idque etiam in mortis articulo, si alius sacerdos, licet non approbatus ad confessiones, sine gravi aliqua exoritura infamia et scandalo, possit excipere morientis confessionem, excepto casu quo moribundus recuset alii confiteri.

§ 2. Eandem excommunicationem non effugit absolvens vel fingens absolvere complicem qui peccatum quidem complicitatis, a quo nondum est absolutus, non confitetur, sed ideo ita se gerit, quia ad id a complice confessario sive directe sive indirecte inductus est.

Those who absolve, or feign to absolve, an accomplice in peccato turpi, ipso facto incur the excommunication reserved modo specialissimo to the Apostolic See.

To what was said on this subject elsewhere[1] only a few remarks need be added:

4 S. C. EE. et RR., Sept. 3, 1746 (Bizzarri, Collectanea, p. 365).

1 See this Commentary, Vol. IV, p. 291 ff. Hearing (voluntarily and knowingly) the confession of an accomplice is forbidden by the natural law on account of the danger of temptation; D'Annibale, l. c., p. 55, n. 85.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

1. The act forbidden under censure and declared invalid by can. 884 is absolution, not merely hearing confession. Therefore, any manifest refusal to absolve ("I am not in a condition to absolve you," etc.) would be sufficient to ward off the censure.

2. Feigning to absolve would not render one immune from the penalty. To feign or simulate (fingere) is to make an act or thing appear real or true when it is not so. To absolve fictitiously, therefore, would be to act as if absolution were given and thus lead the penitent to consider himself absolved. Thus giving a penance and making the sign of the cross, or even omitting the penance and giving the blessing in a way which the penitent could construe as an absolution, would be simulation or fictitious absolution, provided there were a dolus on the part of the confessor.[2]

3. § 2 of can. 2367 states explicitly that the censure is incurred even if the confessor absolves an accomplice who does not confess the sin of complicity from which he was not yet absolved, but conceals that sin, because he was induced by the confessor not to confess it either directly or indirectly.

This text is taken verbally from a decision of the S. Poenitentiaria,[3] which also explains the terms directly and indirectly.

A confessor would induce an accomplice directly if he would previously tell him or her not to mention the sin of complicity, because he already knows of it or because its manifestation would be useless. He would induce the accomplice indirectly if he would persuade him or her that the turpis actus is no sin or not grievous enough

2 Thus Eichmann, l. c., p. 201; but the dolus is presumed, according to can. 2200, § 2.

3 Feb. 19, 1896 (Coll. P. F., n. 1916).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

to scruple about, thus leading the penitent to conclude that the sin of complicity need not be mentioned and causing him not to mention it. It can no longer be taught, therefore, as was the case before the promulgation of the Code, that simulating absolution would render the confessor immune from censure.[4] For, as the above-quoted decision of the S. Poenitentiaria clearly states, such an admission would render the censure almost illusory.

4. From the same decision,[5] as well as from our text itself, we may indirectly deduce that if the sin of complicity had been properly and lawfully absolved by another confessor, the censure would not be incurred by the guilty priest, even though the accomplice would mention it to him in the confessional.[6]

5. The complicity must concern a peccatum turpe, i. e., contra sextum, which amounts to a grievous sin.[7] Besides, since complicity here refers to the act of absolution, it is evident that, if the confessor does not recognize the penitent as his accomplice in peccato turpi, he may lawfully and validly absolve him. The same is true in case of a positive and well-founded doubt about the identity of the person.[8]

6. As to the case of necessity, can. 2254 must be consulted. But this very canon refers to our canon 2367, which, in § 1, determines the mortis articulus as follows: In point of death, i. e., when the danger of death is real

4 S. O., Dec. 5, 1883 (Coll. cit., n. 1608).

5 S. Poenit, l. c.

6 D'Annibale, l. c., p. 57, n. 87.

7 D'Annibale, l. c., p. 54, n. 84: "Ut peccatum adsit ultro citroque, ac ultro citroque grave in ipso opere externo."—S. O., May 28, 1873: "Comprehendi nedum tactus, verum omnia peccata gravia et exterius commissa contra castitatem, etiam illa quae consistunt in meris colloquiis et aspectibus, quae complicitatem important"; Hollweck, l. c., 330, note 5.

8 D'Annibale, l. c., p. 56, n. 86; Hollweck, ib., note 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

and certain, provided no other priest, whether endowed with jurisdiction for hearing confessions or not, can be called without serious infamy or scandal. If another priest is available, he must be called, under penalty of censure, unless the dying person should refuse to confess to another priest.[9]

7. Concerning ignorance it has been declared that neither ignorantia crassa nor supina, much less, of course, affectata, excuses from censure.[10] Absolution from occult cases of this kind is not included in the power granted to the Ordinaries by the Code.[11]

8. Finally, it may be observed that members of the Oriental rites are also subject to this censure.[12]

SOLLICITATIO

Can. 2368

§ 1. Qui sollicitationis crimen de quo in can. 904, commiserit, supendatur a celebratione Missae et ab audiendis sacramentalibus confessionibus vel etiam pro delicti gravitate inhabilis ad ipsas excipiendas declaretur, privetur omnibus beneficiis, dignitatibus, voce activa et passiva, et inhabilis ad ea omnia declaretur, et in casibus gravioribus degradationi quoque subiiciatur.

§ 2. Fidelis vero, qui scienter omiserit eum, a quo sollicitatus fuerit, intra mensem denuntiare contra praescriptum can. 904, incurrit in excommunicationem latae sententiae nemini reservatam, non absolvendus

9 See Vol. IV of our Commentary, p. 292.

10 S. O., Jan. 13, 1892 ad 3 (Coll. P. F., n. 1777); see can. 2229.

11 See can. 2237, § 2; S. O., Sept. 13, 1859, ad 2–3 (Coll. cit., n. 1181).

12 S. C. P. F., Aug. 5, 1885 (ib., n. 1640).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

nisi postquam obligationi satisfecerit aut se satisfacturum serio promiserit.

1. What solicitation means has been explained under can. 894 and 904. The earliest document referring to this crime is the Constitution of Pius IV, "Cum sicut nuper," of April 16, 1561, which was directly intended for Spain. The Constitution of Gregory XV, "Universi," of Aug. 30, 1622, had a general bearing, and is more explicit as to the nature and extent of solicitation. The source par excellence of our Code is the Constitution of Benedict XIV, "Sacramentum poenitentiae," of June 1, 1741.

That feigned confession is also intended seems to follow from the term praetextus, which indicates a simulated act committed in order to accomplish the evil intention more freely.[1]

2. The Code says that those guilty of the crime of

1 Cfr. Thesaurus-Giraldi, l. c., P. II, p. 413 f. The words of the constitution of Bened. XIV: "vel etiam extra occasionem confessionis in confessionali," seem to indicate that simulation is included; see also Hollweck, l. c., p. 328, note 5. However, D'Annibale, l. c., p. 117, n. 181 makes some noteworthy restrictions concerning simulation, which we will quote verbatim: "Simulatione confessionis, reus sollicitationis intelligitur, qui dum fingit confessionem audire, provocat ad turpia. Verum ut videatur simulare confessionem, opus est ut specie tenus, qua alii decipiantur, confessio agi videatur. Proinde necesse est, ut stet vel in confessionario, vel in loco destinato, aut electo ad audiendas confessiones; utque nedum in hoc, et in isto, quod nemo dubitat, sed in illo fingat se confessionem audire. Praetextu, qui v. c. aliquem ad confessionem invitat, ut provocet ad turpia, licet ad veram confessionem invitet: praetextus enim est quod intentionem obtegit facto aliquo seu apparenti, seu vero. Quocirca sollicitatio cessat, si non ipse, sed poenitens confessionem praetexuit; vel ipse quidem, sed ut alium, (non poenitentem) deciperet; vel uterque ex condicto ut alios fallerent. Verum si is cubiculum aegrotantis ingressus, rogatu ipsius adstantes recesserint, et remanserit solus cum sola quasi confessionem excepturus, nonne videtur eam sollicitare simulatione confessionis? Minime, quippe non sollicitat occasione confessionis, sed turpiter agit." (St. Alph., VI, 679).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

solicitation, according to can. 904, (a) are to be suspended from saying Mass and hearing confessions or declared incapable of hearing sacramental confession, according to the grievousness of the crime; (b) Should also be deprived of all benefices and dignities and of the active and passive vote, and be declared incapable of holding or exercising both; (c) In more serious cases they should be subjected to degradation.

3. All these penalties are ferendae sententiae, and therefore require a procedure in conformity with the instructions alleged elsewhere.[2] According to the Constitution quoted above, the inquisitors and local Ordinaries are the guardians and executors of criminal procedure and sentence in cases of solicitation. The Constitutions except no dignitary from these penalties. Cardinals, however, are clearly exempt under can. 2227, § 2. But to exempt bishops from them on the plea that inquisitors would be incompetent to proceed against them and for the reason that they are not wont to hear confessions,[3] is more than we can understand. For the Holy Office can always be approached, and the Pontiff in person could take cognizance of such a case, according to can. 1557, § 1, n. 3. The other plea, that bishops are not accustomed to hear confessions, has no foundation in our country, where many a bishop takes his regular turn in the confessional in the cathedral and elsewhere.

Degradation, according to the Constitution of Gregory XV, was to be decreed only for enormous crimes of solicitation, and after being degraded, the culprits were to be handed over to the secular power.

2 See Vol. IV of this Commentary, p. 343 ff.; S. O., March 18, 1863 (Coll. P. F., n. 1237).

3 Thus some authors quoted by Hollweck, l. c., p. 327 note 2, who, however, with Berardi, leans to the opinion stated above. Besides, can. 2227, § 2, does not exempt bishops from these penalties.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

§ 2 of can. 2368 imposes the strict obligation on every person solicited by a confessor to denounce the latter. Whoever knowingly omits such denunciation for a month, as prescribed by can. 904, incurs excommunication latae sententiae, reserved to no one, from which, however, he cannot be absolved unless he has complied with, or seriously promised to satisfy, his obligation.

The duty of denouncing clearly binds whenever the following circumstances [4] concur:

1. The person to be denounced must be a priest; he may be of any rank or dignity, cardinals and, possibly,[5] bishops, excepted.

2. The solicitation must be ad inhonesta et turpia, sive verbis, sive signis, sive nutibus, sive tactu, sive per scripturam, tunc aut postea legendam, i. e., a mutual, grievous, external sin against the sixth commandment, committed with a person of the same or the other sex, whether solicited for himself (the confessor) or for another person; whether the solicited person consented or not.[6]

3. The solicitation must, in one way or another, concern confession, either as occasion or pretext, either in a place properly destined for confession or at least connected with the act of confession, — immediately before or immediately after. It is, however, immaterial whether the penitent understood the solicitation at once or only afterwards. But there can be no obligation of denouncing the confessor if the solicitation was not certain.[7] How long a time may intervene between the

4 "Sacramentum Poenitentiae"; Thesaurus-Giraldi, l. c., p. 413 f.; D'Annibale, l. c., p. 114 f., n. 179.

5 Because of the controversy stated above; besides there is another reason which renders the case somewhat unlike, viz.: shyness in denouncing a bishop.

6 In the procedure the person must not be asked whether he or she consented to the solicitation.

7 D'Annibale, l. c., n. 182.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

solicitation and the cessation of the obligation to denounce the culprit, is not definitely stated.[8]

4. As to difficulties arising from circumstances of time and person, especially in the case of women, it must be said that as long as such circumstances prevail, they are not obliged to denounce the culprit.[9]

5. The time when the censure is incurred is after one month, to be reckoned from the moment the penitent knew or became aware of his or her obligation and of the censure attached to the omission. Those who seriously promise to make denunciation — an oath is not required — may be absolved from the censure even after a month has elapsed.[10]

VIOLATION OF THE SEAL OF CONFESSION

Can. 2369

§ 1. Cofessarium, qui sigillum sacramentale directe violare praesumpserit, manet excommunicatio specialissimo modo Sedi Apostolicae reservata; qui vero indirecte tantum, obnoxius est poenis, de quibus in can. 2368, § 1.

§ 2. Quicunque praescriptum can. 889, § 2 temere violaverit, pro reatus gravitate plectatur salutari poena, quae potest esse etiam excommunicatio.

There are two ways of breaking the seal of confession, as described in the fourth volume of this Commentary.[1]

8 The "Sacramentum Poenitentiae" merely says: "nec post longum tempus," and hence triennial prescription is not admitted; Thesaurus-Giraldi, l. c., p. 415; also can. 1703 excludes from prescription cases to be brought before the Holy office.

9 See Vol. IV of this Commentary, p. 342.

10 D'Annibale, l. c., p. 119, n. 183.

1 Page 302; but the or in line 5 from above should be changed into and; for different cases see the moralists, especially Ballerini-Pal-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Violation is direct if, together with the matter confessed, the name of the penitent is revealed, either explicitly or by a description which reveals his identity. It is indirect if, from the confessor's way of acting or speaking there is danger that the sin of the penitent and his identity become known, thus rendering confession hateful.

Can. 889, § 2, obliges also interpreters and all others who may in any way have acquired knowledge of confession, to keep the seal.

1. A confessor, says our canon (§ 1), who dares to break the seal of confession directly, remains under excommunication reserved modo specialissimo to the Apostolic See.

a) The term confessor implies a priest[2]; as to others who are not priests, whether laymen or clerics, consult can. 2322. But whether the term supposes jurisdiction is not quite certain. Can. 2366 punishes such priests with suspension a divinis. Could it be a sacramental confession if made to a priest bereft of jurisdiction? To make such a confession, an accusation of sins in order to obtain absolution is required. On the other hand, the seal of confession was instituted in favor of the penitent and the Sacrament. From this we should conclude that even a priest destitute of jurisdiction would fall under this censure. Yet we candidly confess that the opposite view is just as probable. For the text, by employing the term confessor, supposes a priest having jurisdiction, — at least, as we say, general faculties. Besides, since this is a most grievous penalty, it should not be extended to any one not comprised under the name of confessor.

mieri, l. c., Vol. V, p. 485 ff.; nn. 899 ff.

2 See Schmalzgrueber, V, 38, n. 80.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

b) The text furthermore says, sigillum sacramentale, which naturally presupposes a sacramental accusation. Therefore a fictitious or jocose confession would not induce the obligation of keeping the seal, nor entail censure. Whether a sacramental confession is intended must be judged from the words or acts which surround the deed. However the mere lack of intention of absolving the penitent would not be sufficient to excuse the confessor from the obligation of keeping the seal, though if he were to say: "I don't wish to hear your confession," this would render the accusation non-sacramental, and no obligation would arise to keep the seal.[3] The general rule, therefore, may be stated thus: The censure is incurred whenever the obligation of keeping the sacramental seal is violated.

c) But there is a condition to be added, namely, unless the penitent himself — none other, not even the Pope, can do so — has given permission to reveal something out of confession. This permission would have to be given expressly and freely.[4]

Note that the revelation of something else than the matter of confession would not constitute a violation of the seal. Besides, most authors say that a revelation of merely venial sins, confessed in a general way, though by a definite person, would not constitute a serious violation of the seal involving censure.[5]

d) The penalty is excommunication latae sententiae reserved modo specialissimo to the Apostolic See, provided presumption is verified. Therefore inadvertency or 3 Schmalzgrueber, V, 38, n. 80; Ballerini-Palmieri, l. c., V, p. 490 f.; n. 909 f.

4 Schmalzgrueber, l. c., n. 62; Hollweck, l. c., p. 276, note 5.

5 Ballerini-Palmieri, l. c., V, p. 499 ff.; n. 924 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

indeliberate revelation would not induce the penalty, which formerly was deposition and perpetual banishment of the culprit to a monastery.[6]

2. Those who violate the seal of confession indirectly are liable to the same penalties as those who are guilty of solicitation (see can. 2368, § 1) ferendae sententiae.

3. Those mentioned above and in can. 889, § 2, namely, interpreters and bystanders, who rashly (temere) violate the seal of confession, are to be punished with wholesome penalties, according to the seriousness of the crime, excommunication not excluded.

The following five canons treat of Orders; and the first of episcopal consecration, for which a papal mandate is required, as stated elsewhere.[1]

EPISCOPAL CONSECRATION WITHOUT AN APOSTOLIC MANDATE

Can. 2370

Episcopus aliquem consecrans in Episcopum, Episcopi vel, loco Episcoporum, presbyteri assistentes, et qui consecrationem recipit sine apostolico mandato contra praescriptum can. 953, ipso iure suspensi sunt, donec Sedes Apostolica eos dispensaverit.

A bishop who consecrates another, and the assistant bishops or the priests taking their place, as well as the one who receives episcopal consecration without having obtained an Apostolic mandate, are suspended ipso iure until the Holy See has granted a dispensation. This is a general suspension, but has the character of a vin-

6 See c. 2, Dist. 6, de Poenit.; c. 12, X, V, 38.

1 See Vol. IV of this Commentary, p. 414 f.; can. 953.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dictive penalty.[2] An example of its effective application may be seen in a papal constitution of historical importance.[3]

SIMONIACAL ADMINISTRATION AND RECEPTION OF ORDERS AND SACRAMENTS

Can. 2371

Omnes, etiam episcopali dignitate aucti, qui per simoniam ad ordines scienter promoverint vel promoti fuerint aut alia Sacramenta ministraverint vel receperint, sunt suspecti de haeresi; clerici praeterea suspensionem incurrunt Sedi Apostolicae reservatam.

Simony is clearly defined in the Code itself, as explained elsewhere.[4] Not only real simony, but also conventional simony, which requires no fulfillment of the simoniacal contract, is punishable, the only supposition being that a simoniacal agreement existed. Suspicion of heresy is founded on can. 727, § 1.

1. Those, then, who have knowingly ordained any one, as well as those who have been ordained through simony, are suspect of heresy, and must consequently be treated according to can. 2315.

Note that by ordo is also understood the first tonsure, as per can. 950 and the Council of Trent.[5] However, the act must be complete, i. e., the order must have been

2 See can. 2278, § 2; can. 2298, n. 2; 2227, § 2; 2236, § 1: "dispensaverit."

3 Pius VI, "Charitas," April 13, 1791, § 15: the civil constitution of the French Clergy; three bishops had consecrated another without an Apostolic mandate, nay without as much as consulting the local ordinary.

4 Vol. IV of this Commentary, pp. 5 ff.

5 Sess. 21, c. 1, de ref.; the oldest source is c. 8, C. 1, q. 1, taken from the Council of Chalcedon; see also c. 1, X, V, 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

conferred before the penalty is incurred, even though the price agreed upon was not paid and perhaps never will be paid, provided only an agreement was made. Then, the act of simony must have been committed knowingly (scienter) as per can. 2229, § 2. If it was committed by a third person with the ordaining minister, but the one ordained knew nothing of it, he would not fall under this canon, even if simony was committed according to can. 727.

2. Suspected of heresy are also those, bishops not excepted, who administer or receive other Sacraments simoniacally, supposing always that an agreement to that effect has been entered into.

Purely mental simony, though it may be grievous, is not intended by the Code. Thus it may happen that one administers the Sacraments merely for the sake of the stole fee; but as long as he does not make a formal agreement or utter his intention in an unmistakable way, with the other's consent, no simony in the sense of the law is committed.

Bishops too, we said, are included; for the position of the clause at the beginning doubtless comprises them.

Is the scienter placed between ordines and promoverint to be supplied in the ministraverint? We hardly think so, because the position of the word makes it appear to have reference only to orders. The reason probably is because Orders are intended chiefly for the public good and the welfare of society at large, and therefore the legislator wished to spare prelates unnecessary scruples.[6] The other Sacraments are more or less of a [6] Clement VIII, "Romanum Pontificem decet," Feb. 28, 1595 (Bull. Luxemburg., III, 60): "ab ordinum collatione deterreri," on account of scruples and the fear of the severe penalties threatened by Sixtus V, "Sanctum et salutare," Jan. 5, 1589, § 6, § 2 (Bull. cit., II, 711 f).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

private character and, therefore, left to the uprightness of individuals.

3. Clerics offending against this canon also incur suspension reserved to the Apostolic See. Are bishops included in this clause. Some deny,[7] others assert it,[8] There seems to be little doubt that they are. Can. 2227, § 2, cannot be quoted against this view, as bishops are especially mentioned at the very beginning of this canon, and, moreover, the Council of Trent subjected bishops to all the penalties inflicted by law,[9] and the papal constitutions subjected them to the censure here mentioned.[10] Lastly, it must be remembered that bishops are the ministers of orders. There would be no justice, since simony requires an accomplice, if the greater culprit were less punishable than the simple cleric. The bishops, therefore, according to our view, are also subject to this suspension, which is a general one (can. 2278, § 2).

RECEPTION OF ORDERS FROM CENSURED ECCLESIASTICS

Can. 2372

Suspensionem a divinis, Sedi Apostolicae reservatam, ipso facto contrahunt, qui recipere ordines praesumunt ab excommunicato vel suspenso vel interdicto post sententiam declaratoriam vel condemnatoriam, aut a notorio apostata, haeretico, schismatico; qui vero bona fide a quopiam eorum sit ordinatus, exercitio careat ordinis sic recepti donec dispensetur.

7 Thus Ayrinhac, l. c., p. 331, without giving a reason.

8 Thus Eichmann, l. c., p. 207.

9 See cc. 6, 8, 101, 107, 113, C. 1. q. 1; c. 4, C. 2, q. 5; cc. 4, 5, 11, 13, X, V, 3.

10 Clement VIII (l. c.,) modified the Constitution of Sixtus V, but left the censure.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The older sources of this canon seem to be conflicting. Some insinuate that the order received from bishops mentioned in the text was invalid,[1] whilst the majority clearly state that it was valid, though illicit.[2] Yet even the former may be explained of the exercise of orders.[3] Our text is taken in a somewhat modified form from the "Apostolicae Sedis."[4]

1. Those who dare to receive Orders from an excommunicated, suspended, or interdicted minister, provided he has been declared such or condemned to one of the three afore-mentioned penalties, or from a notorious apostate, a notorious heretic, or a notorious schismatic, ipso facto incur suspension a divinis, reserved to the Apostolic See.

That orders includes episcopal consecration, seems to us evident from can. 950, even though the majority of authors[5] does not maintain this view.

The penalties must have been declared, or must have been incurred by a condemnatory sentence. Formerly a nominal or personal denunciation was required. Notoriety of fact is here intended (can. 2197, n. 3), not of law, the latter not being required, as per can. 2314, unless a declaratory sentence should be necessary in virtue of can. 2223, § 4. But the term praesumunt also requires full knowledge of the fact that the ordaining minister was under censure, or had been condemned,

1 C. 33, C. 24, q. 1; cc. 41, 73, III, C. 1, q. 1; c. 24, C. 1, q. 7.

2 C. 8, Dist. 19; cc. 24, 25, C. 1, q. 7; c. 2, X, V, 8; this latter settles the former controversy.

3 Kober, Die Suspension, p. 189; Hollweck, p. 295, note 1; D'Annibale, l. c., p. 129, n. 205.

4 § V, 6: "Suspensionem ab ordine suscepto ipso iure incurrunt, qui eundem ordinem recipere praesumpserunt ab excommunicato vel suspenso, vel interdicto, nominatim denuntiato, aut haeretico vel schismatico notorio: eum vero qui bona fide a quopiam eorum est ordinatus, exercitium non habere ordinis sic suscepti, donec dispensetur, declaramus."

5 Hollweck, l. c., p. 295, note 3.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

or that he is a notorious apostate, heretic, or schismatic.[6]

Besides, it is generally held that the order must have been received validly, and therefore the penalty would not follow if, for instance, a Protestant bishop would confer an order.[7] The penalty is suspension a divinis (can. 2279, § 2, n. 2), excluding the exercise of any act of the power of orders.

2. Those who have been bona fide ordained by one of the above-named persons forbidden by law to administer orders, may not exercise the orders thus received, until they are dispensed. This dispensation can be given by the Ordinary to whom the ordinatus is subject.[8] It is a vindictive penalty, but irregularity would follow unlawful exercise of the Order thus received.[9]

ILLEGAL ORDINATION

Can. 2373

In suspensionem per annum ab ordinum collatione Sedi Apostolicae reservatam ipso facto incurrunt;

1°. Qui contra praescriptum can. 955, alienum subditum sine Ordinarii proprii litteris dimissoriis ordinaverint;

2°. Qui subditum proprium, qui alibi tanto tempore moratus sit ut canonicum impedimentum contrahere ibi potuerit, ordinaverint contra praescriptum can. 993, n. 4, 994;

3°. Qui aliquem ad ordines maiores sine titulo ca-

6 Mere hearsay or knowledge received from unofficial sources is not sufficient.

7 D'Annibale, l. c., p. 206.

8 Ibid. and Hollweck, l. c., p. 296, note 7; cc. 1, 2, X, I, 13.

9 Can. 985, n. 7.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

nonico promoverint contra praescriptum can. 974, § 1, n. 7;

4°. Qui, salvo legitimo privilegio, religiosum, ad familiam pertinentem quae sit extra territorium ipsius ordinantis, promoverint, etiam cum litteris dimissorialibus proprii Superioris, nisi legitime probatum fuerit aliquem e casibus occurrere, de quibus in can. 966.

This canon furnishes the proper sanction of the laws laid down concerning the episcopus proprius (n. 1-2), the canonical title (n. 3), and the competent Ordinary with regard to religious. We may be permitted to refer the reader to the canons mentioned.

Suspension from conferring orders for one year, to be reckoned from the date of ordination and reserved to the Apostolic See, is ipso facto incurred

1. By those who ordain a subject of another Ordinary without dimissorial letters from that Ordinary, as per can. 955;

2. By those who ordain one of their own subjects, but without testimonials from the Ordinaries in whose dioceses the ordinand has lived long enough to contract a canonical impediment, as prescribed by can. 993, n. 4, and can. 994;

3. By those who confer major orders without a canonical title, as per can. 974, § 1, n. 7 (see also can. 980, § 2, 3);

4. By those who ordain a religious who belongs to a religious family located outside of the ordaining minister's territory, even though the aforesaid religious have dimissorial letters from his own superior; unless the certificate of the episcopal chancery proves that the case was one admitted by can. 966 or the exempt religious order has obtained a privilege permitting it to have its subjects ordained by any bishop.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ILLEGAL RECEPTION OF ORDERS

Can. 2374

Qui sine litteris vel cum falsis dimissoriis litteris, vel ante canonicam aetatem, vel per saltum ad ordines malitiose accesserit, est ipso facto a recepto ordine suspensus; qui autem sine litteris testimonialibus vel detentus aliqua censura, irregularitate aliove impedimento, gravibus poenis secundum rerum adiuncta puniatur.

1. Ipso facto suspended from the exercise of an order (illegally) [1] received are those who maliciously present [2] themselves for Ordination

a) Without any dimissorial or with false dimissorial letters (see can. 958). The term false letters includes such as are forged, and consequently can. 2362 applies here. But the term also means letters issued by incompetent authorities (can. 958). Thus the vicar-general needs a special commission and the vicar capitular or administrator can issue them only after a year of vacancy;

b) Without having reached the canonical age, as per can. 975, or not being duly dispensed from this impediment;

c) Without observing the order prescribed by can. 977 (ordinations per saltum).

1 The other orders, which the cleric has received properly, he may exercise; see Trid., Sess. 6, c. 5, de ref.; Hollweck, l. c., p. 297, n. 4.

2 Accedere means to approach, and could therefore be construed as if the penalty were incurred, even though ordination did not actually follow; however, the text refers to orders actually received.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2. Those who maliciously present themselves for ordination are to be punished grievously, according to the circumstances of each case.

a) This class includes those who have not the required testimonials (see can. 993-1001), or

b) who are under censure, be it excommunication, or interdict, or suspension, or who are bound by an irregularity of defect or crime (can. 984, 985), or by a canonical impediment (can. 987).

UNLAWFUL MIXED MARRIAGES

Can. 2375

Catholici qui matrimonium mixtum, etsi validum, sine Ecclesiae dispensatione inire ausi fuerint, ipso facto ab actibus legitimis ecclesiasticis et Sacramentalibus exclusi manent, donec ab Ordinario dispensationem obtinuerint.

Catholics who dare to contract a mixed, even though valid, marriage without ecclesiastical dispensation, are ipso facto debarred from legal ecclesiastical acts and from the Sacraments, until they have obtained a dispensation from the Ordinary.

1. Mixed religion constitutes a prohibitive impediment, which does not invalidate a marriage, but requires a dispensation to make it licit.

2. If the form prescribed in canons 1094 and 1099 has been omitted, the marriage is invalid.

3. Can. 1098 permits the full form to be omitted when there is danger of death or when the pastor, or Ordinary, or a delegate, cannot be reached.

The ausi fuerint is verified if the Catholic party, know-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ing that a dispensation is necessary and possessing the necessary means of communicating with the ecclesiastical authorities, neglects to ask for the dispensation. Deception of the pastor or assisting priest is possible, though not likely to occur, except in cases of elopement.

4. Such parties, provided they give signs of true repentance and accept the required conditions, may be admitted to the Sacraments [1];

5. But they are excluded from the ecclesiastical acts enumerated in can. 2256, n. 2.

6. This penalty lasts until the Ordinary dispenses from it, because it is a vindictive penalty, and dispensation here refers to the penalty, not to the impediment of mixed religion. Besides, no dispensation is required after the marriage is contracted.[2]

1 S. O., Aug. 23, 1877; Feb. 10, 1892 (Coll. P. F., nn. 1478, 1783).

2 See Vol. V of this Commentary, p. 159. We may be permitted to say a word here in defense of this volume against a review of the same in the October number of the Irish Theological Quarterly. We regret to say that the critic does not appear to be competent, having betrayed his incompetency in reviewing our first volume by putting a synodal decree on the same level with the Code. Besides mere platitudes and general aspersions, we believe, should be avoided by a conscientious critic. There are, as a well-known professor in Rome used to say, when he was attacked by some writers, "boni viri, sed non tenentur scribere."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

TITLE XVII

VIOLATION OF THE OBLIGATIONS PROPER TO THE CLERICAL OR RELIGIOUS STATE

Under this heading fall the obligations mentioned in Book II, which determines the duties of the clerical state as such (Title III) and of the religious state in particular (Title XIII, Ch. 1). But it must be understood that the obligations peculiar to the clerical state are also incumbent on religious who belong to the clerical state, unless the wording makes it plain that religious are not comprehended. This shall be indicated under each canon.

REFUSAL TO MAKE EXAMINATIONS

Can. 2376

Sacerdotes qui neque ab Ordinario dispensati neque legitimo impedimento detenti examen de quo in can. 130 facere renuerint, ab Ordinario congruis poenis ad illud cogantur.

Priests who, without a dispensation from the Ordinary or a lawful impediment, refuse to make the examination required by can. 130, shall be compelled by suitable penalties to do so.

1. The above-quoted canon 130 requires yearly examination for a term of three years after the completion of a priest's theological studies.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

2. All secular priests, even though they have obtained a parochial office or a canonicate, must submit to this examination, unless they are exempted from it by the Ordinary. Religious are not bound by this canon, but by can. 590.

3. To refuse is a positive act (facere renuerint), although mere failure to appear at the examination would amount practically to the same thing, provided the time and matter of examination had been duly appointed and made known. In case of a lawful impediment, the Ordinary or the diocesan chancery must be notified, which may be done through the rural dean.

4. The penalty is arbitrary but preceptive (can. 2223). Except in case of protracted stubbornness, censures should not be used (can. 2241, § 2).

STUBBORN ABSENCE FROM PASTORAL CONFERENCES

Can. 2377

Sacerdotes contra praescriptum can. 131, § 1 contumaces, Ordinarius pro suo prudenti arbitrio puniat; quod si fuerint religiosi confessarii curam animarum non gerentes, eos ab audiendis saecularium confessionibus suspendat.

This canon embodies the sanction for can. 131, which relates to the pastoral conferences that are to be held several times a year. At these all secular priests as well as all religious who have charge of souls should be present, and also those other religious who hold faculties for hearing confessions in the diocese, provided no such conferences are held in their monasteries or convents, according to can. 591. Therefore the local Ordinary is entitled to know of this fact, even in exempt monasteries, unless a special privilege exempts them from attendance at the diocesan conferences.[1]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1. Priests who resist the law laid down in can. 131, § 1, should be punished by the Ordinary according to his good judgment. The name sacerdotes here includes religious who are in charge of souls, whether as pastors or assistants (curates). These also may, therefore, be punished according to can. 616, § 2. But contumacy must precede, and this supposes a canonical, not merely a paternal, warning (can. 2307). Although such a warning is to be given to all who are engaged as pastors, curates, or confessors, yet, says one decision, against secular priests who have no such charge, the bishop should proceed with exhortations and admonitions rather than with penalties.[2]

2. Religious who, though not in charge of souls, are confessors of Sisters or transient helpers in the confessional must, in case of contumacy, be suspended from hearing confessions, provided, of course, no pastoral conferences are held at their religious house.

SERIOUS NEGLECT OF RITES AND CEREMONIES

Can. 2378

Clerici maiores qui in sacro ministerio ritus et caeremonias ab Ecclesia praescriptas graviter negligant et moniti sese non emendaverint, suspendantur pro diversa reatus gravitate.

1 Regulars who neither have charge of souls nor enjoy the usual faculties, cannot be compelled to attend diocesan conferences; S. C. EE. et RR., Aug. 23, 1593; Oct. 13, 1593 (Regesta, fol. 265[d], fol. 309[a]), implied in can. 131.

2 S. C. EE. et RR., Aug. 2, 1594 (Regesta, fol. 224[b]).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Clerics in higher orders who in the sacred ministry grievously neglect the rites and ceremonies prescribed by the Church, and, when admonished, do not amend their ways, should be suspended according to the seriousness of their guilt.

1. The books which contain the rites and ceremonies of the Church are the Roman Ritual, the Missal, the Pontifical, and the rules governing these rites are called rubrics, of which mention is made elsewhere.[1] The rubrics here especially intended are those governing the administration of the Sacraments and sacramentals as well as the celebration of Holy Mass.[2]

2. The grievousness of the offence is to be gauged by the importance of the rubrics, the scandal given, and the duration of the neglect. Rural deans are called upon to watch over the pastors of their districts and the pastors over their assistants.[3]

3. In proceeding against offenders, the Ordinary must first issue a canonical warning according to can. 2307 and then await amendment within the term stated.

4. If no amendment follows, suspension must be inflicted, and it may be either total or partial, for a definite or an indefinite time, either as a censure or a vindictive penalty.[4]

1 See Vol. IV of this Commentary, p. 157.

2 See can. 755–761; 814–819; 945–947; 1002–1004; 1148.

3 Can. 447, § 1, n. 4; 476, § 7; concerning chapters can. 415, § 3, n. 2. This, of course, does not mean that every new rubric must at once be applied and insisted upon, as if the salvation of souls depended on a Talmudic observance of rites.

4 See can. 1933, § 4; 2278, f.; 2298, n. 2.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

REFUSAL TO WEAR THE CLERICAL DRESS

Can. 2379

Clerici, contra praescriptum can. 136, habitum ecclesiasticum et tonsuram clericalem non gestantes, graviter moneantur; transacto inutiliter mense a monitione, quod ad clericos minores attinet, servetur praescriptum eiusdem can. 136, § 3; clerici autem maiores, salvo praescripto can. 188, n. 7, ab ordinibus receptis suspendantur, et si ad vitae genus a statu clericali alienum notorie transierint, nec, rursus moniti, resipuerint, post tres menses ab hac ultima monitione deponantur.

The clerical dress spoken of in can. 136 is the one usually worn by clergymen. It differs in different countries. Everyone knows the habit and usage of our country, except perhaps foreigners.[1]

The present canon may be said to contain three clauses: one applying to clerics in general, the second to clerics in minor orders, the third to clerics in major orders.

1. Clerics who do not wear the clerical dress and tonsure, as prescribed by can. 136, are to be seriously warned; which means that a formal admonition must be addressed to them according to can. 2143 and 2307, and put on record.

2. As to clerics in minor orders, can. 136, § 3 says that they are ipso facto reduced to the lay state if the canonical warning just mentioned is unheeded for one

1 Thus we lately heard of a foreign bishop who travelled through our country in cassock and prelatial colors.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

month (30 days). Therefore such clerics lose the clerical rank and its privileges without a formal sentence. However, we believe that, since the public welfare[2] is here concerned, a declaratory sentence, according to can. 2223, § 4, should be issued.

3. Clerics in higher orders should be dealt with as follows:

a) If they do not put on clerical dress within a month from the date of the canonical warning, their office becomes vacant without any further declaration, just as if they had resigned,— provided, of course, they hold an office — and they must, besides, be suspended from the orders which they have already received.

b) If, besides refusing to wear the clerical dress and letting the canonical warning go unheeded, they notoriously take up a mode of life not compatible with the clerical state, they must again be warned. If this second canonical warning also goes unheeded, they must be deposed after the third month (or 90 days), to be reckoned from the day of the last warning.

A state or vocation of life not becoming the clerical character would be one of those mentioned under can. 139, 141, 142 (store or saloon-keeper, etc.). However, the fact of the cleric's having embraced this state must be notorious, i. e., notorietate facti, which supposes a knowledge of the higher clerical state.

The penalty for clerics in minor orders is latae sententiae, whereas those for clerics in major orders are ferendae sententiae. Consequently, if a cleric has never been suspended or deposed, even though he may have

2 Because of the public character of the clergy and of the clerical privileges.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

been for several years a public teacher, unknown to the people as a priest, no absolution or dispensation is required.[3]

Discarding the clerical dress does not ipso facto entail a censure for clerics in higher orders. The penalty is prescriptive, which is to be understood according to can. 2223.

Although this canon does not strictly apply to religious who wear a habit of their own, yet the Ordinary may, under can. 616, § 2, proceed also against religious who neglect to wear the clerical dress customary in their country.

TRADING FORBIDDEN TO CLERICS

Can. 2380

Clerici vel religiosi mercaturam vel negotiationem per se aut per alios exercentes contra praescriptum can. 142, congruis poenis pro gravitate culpae ab Ordinario coerceantur.

Clerics or religious who, contrary to can. 142, practice a trade or engage in business, either by themselves or through the medium of others, shall be punished by the Ordinary according to the gravity of their guilt.

To what we have said elsewhere[1] on this subject only a few remarks need be added here. The subject is really important, affecting as it does the entire clerical-religious state, and "notions" or consciences sometimes seem to be very much obscured. Negotiatio is generally defined as "the act of buying things with the intention of [3] We were informed of such a case by a late friend of ours.

[1] Vol. II of this Commentary, p. 95 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

selling them unchanged for a higher price." [2] Thus buying land with the sole view of selling it again, is trading; buying shares in mines, railroads, oil, cotton, etc., and selling them at a higher price is styled trading, or in common parlance, at least in the U. S., speculating or even gambling. Buying prayer-books or devotional articles from a firm in order to sell them with profit to pupils or parishioners is trading. The same must be said of books, magazines, calendars, typewriters, etc. All that we can justify in the sale of such articles is that the priest, religious, or religious house may add the additional expense of freight, express or an eventual risk of storage, but nothing more. Religious houses, especially those chartered as benevolent corporations, are not allowed to undertake financial operations.

1. The penalties established by the Constitutions of Urban VIII, "Ex debito," Feb. 22, 1633, and Clement IX, "Solicitudo," June 17, 1669, against trading by missionaries either in or outside of Europe, and which were maintained even after the "Apostolicae Sedis" (1869),[3] are now destitute of legal force, as per can. 6, n. 5.

2. But the declaration given by Benedict XIV, ("Apostolicae servitutis commissum," Feb., 25, 1741) remains in force. This declaration says that trading by commission (alieno nomine) is forbidden. Hence a cleric may not furnish money to, or hire a layman to trade or traffic for him. To do so would be an evasion of the law or a deception. If family affairs or an inheritance compel a cleric to engage in business against his will, the bishop may grant him permission to continue in

2 Wernz, Ius Decret., II, n. 216 (1st ed., Vol. II, p. 310); also Santi-Leitner, Decret. l. III, tit. 50, n. 3. (Coll., nn. 1398, 1589).

3 S. O., Dec: 4, 1872; Jan. 17, 1883; S. C. P. F., March 29, 1873

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

business for a short time, provided a layman acts as the actual administrator and manager (l. c., § 2).

3. The penalty, though preceptive, is arbitrary, but its arbitrary character is somewhat modified by the gravity of the guilt, which is diminished if there is need of temporary support, or if, as stated above, family relations require such conduct. Although deposition and other severe penalties of former laws[4] should not be employed, yet suspension in more stubborn cases would not exceed the bishop's power.

VIOLATION OF THE LAW OF RESIDENCE

Can. 2381

Qui officium, beneficium, dignitatem obtinet cum onere residentiae, si illegitime absit:

1°. Eo ipso privatur omnibus fructibus sui beneficii vel officii pro rata illegitimae absentiae, eosque tradere debet Ordinario, qui ecclesiae vel alicui pio loco vel pauperibus distribuat;

2°. Officio, beneficio, dignitate privetur, ad normam can. 2168-2175.

Those who hold an office, a benefice, or a dignity which obliges them to residence, are, if they unlawfully absent themselves:

1. Ipso facto deprived of the revenues of their office or benefice in proportion to the duration of their unlawful absence, and these revenues, which are of the nature of a fine or vindictive penalty, must be handed over to the Ordinary, who shall distribute them to churches or charitable institutions, or to the poor;

[4] See cc. 2, 3, Dist. 88, c. 1, Clem. III, 1; for filthy lucre's sake.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2. They shall be deprived of their office, benefice, dignity, according to the rules laid down in canons 2168-2175.

We need not again enter into the subject of residence,[1] but merely note that the bishops are not affected by this canon, for the reason stated in can. 338, § 4, where the metropolitan is called upon to report negligent bishops to the Apostolic See.

Who, then, are the dignitaries referred to in this canon? The cathedral and collegiate dignitaries, and none other. Not the prelates nullius or abbots nullius, because they too must choose a metropolitan and have the same obligations as the bishops[2]; nor the vicars or prefects Apostolic, for they are subject to the Apostolic See.[3] Nor religious superiors, for the vow of poverty prevents their assuming any dignities.

Are dignitaries who fail to observe the law of residence bound to give up the revenues received or due during their unlawful absence? Official Roman decisions clearly indicate that they are obliged to make restitution and that the Ordinary may proceed against them according to law.[4] The bishops or Ordinaries obliged to residence, on the other hand, are not bound to surrender the revenues pro rata absentiae, because the text distinctly says that these must be handed to the Ordinary. Therefore deliverer and recipient would be the same person. The Apostolic See shall therefore state what is to be done. As to n. 2, we refer the reader to the canons quoted.

1 See Vol. II of our Commentary, p. 98 f.; p. 358 ff.; p. 545 f.
2 See can. 285; can. 323.
3 See can. 301.
4 S. C. C., Cathac., Nov. 14, 1671 (Richter, Trid., p. 358, n. 71 f.); the procedure against non-resident canons, S. C. C., Vercell., 1573 (ib., n. 71).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

NEGLECT OF PASTORAL DUTIES

Can. 2382

Si parochus graviter neglexerit Sacramentorum administrationem, infirmorum assistentiam, puerorum populique institutionem, concionem diebus dominicis ceterisque festis, custodiam ecclesiae paroecialis, sanctissimae Eucharistiae, sacrorum oleorum, ab Ordinario coercetur ad normam can. 2182-2185.

If a pastor grievously neglects the following duties, the Ordinary must proceed against him according to can. 2182-2185:

1. The administration of the Sacraments, as per can. 467, § 1;
2. Sick calls, as stated in can. 468, § 1;
3. Religious instruction for children and people, as per canons 1329-1336;
4. Preaching on Sundays and holydays of obligation, as per can. 1344;
5. The custody of the parish church, as per can. 1178;
6. The custody of the Holy Eucharist and the holy oils, as per canons 1265-1275 and can. 735.

CARELESSNESS IN KEEPING THE PARISH BOOKS

Can. 2383

Parochus qui paroeciales libros diligenter, ad normam iuris, non conscripserit aut servaverit, a proprio Ordinario pro gravitate culpae puniatur.

Pastors who are careless in keeping records and pre-

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google serving the parish books, as prescribed by law, shall be punished by their own Ordinary according to the gravity of their fault.

The books here mainly, though not exclusively, intended are:

1. The Baptismal Book, which must be kept according to can. 470 and canons 776-778. It should, besides the entry, contain four vacant columns for recording (a) confirmation, (b) marriage, except the marriage of conscience (can. 1107), (c) subdeaconship and (d) solemn profession, — the two latter on account of their being matrimonial impediments,

2. The Confirmation Book, to be kept according to canons 798-799.

3. The Matrimonial Book, to be kept according to can. 1103, but omitting the marriage of conscience (can. 1107) though not omitting the record of an eventual declaration of its nullity (as per can. 1988).

4. The Obituary Book, to be kept according to can. 1238. This is the norma iuris mentioned here, as well as in the Roman Ritual (Tit. x, c. 2). But can. 470, § 1 also demands a record of the census, or status animarum, which should be made as carefully as possible.

Is the pastor obliged to keep all these books personally? There is no doubt that he is responsible personally and sub gravi for these books. But this does not solve the question asked. Our answer would be as follows: Since a man may do through another what he can do himself,[1] a pastor may have the records kept by another. If the pastor were impeded, either by sickness, or absence, or by reason of a very poor handwriting, he certainly could entrust this work to others. Therefore [1] Reg. Iuris 68 et 72 in 6°.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

we cannot see why it should be wrong to entrust the assistant or curate with this task.

Another obligation is that of properly preserving the books mentioned (can. 470, § 4).

The penalty is arbitrary, but preceptive. The Ordinary, says a decision, may proceed with canonical penalties, which means that either censures or vindictive penalties may be employed if necessary.[2] The time of the canonical visitation offers a good opportunity for inspecting these books.[3]

NEGLIGENCE ON THE PART OF THE CANONICUS THEOLOGUS AND POENITENTIARIUS

Can. 2384

Canonicum theologum et poenitentiarium in suis muneribus obeundis negligentes, Episcopus gradatim compellat monitionibus, comminatione poenarum, subtractione portionis fructuum iis assignandae qui illorum vices suppleant; et perdurante per integrum annum negligentia post monitionem, suspensione a beneficio plectat; negligentia vero producta per aliud semestre, ipso beneficio privet.

If the canonicus theologus or the canonicus poenitentiarius should neglect their duties (see can. 308-401), the bishop shall proceed as follows:

1. He shall serve them with a canonical warning (see canons 2143 and 2307), which may contain a threat of penalties, and then, if this warning goes unheeded, he may deprive them of part of their revenues and give them

2 S. C. Sacrament., March 6, 1911, nn. II et IV (A. Ap. S., III, 102 f.).

3 Bened. XIV, "Firmandis," Nov. 6, 1744, § 9, 10.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google to those who take the place[1] of the neglectful priests.

2. If they continue their negligence for one year after this canonical warning they shall be suspended from their benefice (see can. 2280).

3. If their negligence is protracted for another six months, i. e., for eighteen months altogether from the date of the canonical warning, they shall be deprived of their respective benefices.

APOSTATES A RELIGIONE

Can. 2385

Firmo praescripto can. 646, religiosus, apostata a religione, ipso iure incurrit in excommunicationem, proprio Superiori vel, si religio sit laicalis aut non exempta, Ordinario loci in quo commoratur, reservatam, ab actibus legitimis ecclesiasticis est exclusus, privilegiis omnibus suae religionis privatus; et si redierit, perpetuo caret voce activa et passiva, ac praeterea aliis poenis pro gravitate culpae a Superioribus puniri debet ad normam constitutionum.

Apostates a religione are those who, having made profession of perpetual vows, whether solemn or simple, unlawfully leave the religious house with the intention of not returning, or who, having lawfully left the house, do not return to it, with the intention of withdrawing themselves from religious obedience. A perverse intention is presumed after a month of unlawful and unjustified absence (can. 644).

Apostates in another sense are those who publicly deny

1 The place of a canonicus theologus may, in this case, be assigned by the bishop to either a secular or a religious priest; S. C. C., April 27, 1630 (Richter, Trid., p. 19, n. 29).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the Catholic faith, clerics who elope with a person of the opposite sex, or who attempt marriage (can. 646). There is no doubt that those also must be considered apostates who transfer themselves to another religious institute, i. e., another religious order or congregation, without the necessary dispensation.[1] The superior of the institute to which a religious of another order or congregation has repaired, is obliged to make him return to his own institute or, at least, to notify his lawful superior.[2]

It may be asked whether religious who leave their own convent and without due permission transfer themselves to a monastery or convent of the same order, must be considered apostates. The constitution of Paul IV answers in the affirmative,[3] for the text "extra claustra suorum regularium locorum degunt" (to live outside their own regular convents) can mean nothing else but that those religious who leave the convent of their profession without the necessary permission are considered apostates. However, we believe that a distinction must now be made between centralized and non-centralized orders, of which latter the Benedictines furnish an example. For the essence of apostasy, as the term implies, is desertion or defection from the religious state one has chosen by perpetual vows, and subsequent withdrawal from the obedience due to one's legitimate superior. Centralized orders have a central or supreme superior who represents the entire institute. Profession is made in these centralized orders, not for a certain house, but for the province or order, which depends on their Con-

1 Paul IV, "Postquam," July 20, 1558, § 8 (Bull. Luxemb., I, 834).

2 S. C. EE. et RR., Aug. 11, 1758 (Bizzarri, l. c., p. 330).

3 L. c., § 1, 2; even those who held a benefice, i. e., a parish or office of their own order without the necessary permission, were considered apostates; ibid.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

stitutions.[4] The consequence is that one may transfer himself from one monastery to another, and still remain under the same higher superior, and hence he does not violate the vow of obedience. This is clearly expressed in can. 632. The same canon, however, requires an Apostolic indult for a transfer from one independent monastery to another independent monastery, even though it be of the same (so-called) order. Here we have a clear indication of the distinction between various organizations.

The consequence is that unlawful desertion of an autonomous monastery, even though the deserter repairs to another one of the same order or congregation, constitutes apostasy, if the other marks concur. With regard to Benedictine congregations much, of course, depends on whether the subjects of single monasteries pronounce their profession for the congregation as such, or for the individual house. If profession is made for an individual religious house, apostasy is verified in case of illegitimate desertion of that house, even if the deserter would straightway repair to another house of the same congregation. As stated elsewhere,[5] no apostasy or flight would be implied if a religious would seek redress with the Provincial or President or General in case of unjust vexation or manifestly unjust condemnation.

Our canon first states that can. 646 remains in force, and therefore those mentioned therein must be considered apostates. Then it lays down the penalties for apostates from religious institutes, as follows:

1. They ipso facto incur excommunication, which is reserved

4 Also on papal privileges; Lezzana, Summa Quaestionum Regularium, Venet., 1637, p. 187, n. 11.

5 See Vol. III of this Commentary, pp. 382 f.; Lezzana, l. c., p. 188, n. 8.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

a) To their own higher superior, according to can. 488, n. 8, i. e., to the abbot of the monastery, or to the superior general or provincial, or their equals in power, if the apostate is a member of a clerical exempt institute;

b) Or to the local Ordinary in whose diocese the apostate is stationed, if he is a member of a lay or non-exempt organization.

From this censure only the exempt religious superior, or the Pope, or the delegate or successor of the religious superior, can validly absolve, according to can. 2245. Can. 519 cannot here be applied, for this censure is not merely one reserved by or in the religious institute, but reserved by common law to the religious superior.

Under can. 2340, the apostate, if he obstinately remains under censure for one year, becomes suspect of heresy and must be treated as such according to can. 2315. This may be a case of censure reserved to the local Ordinary, if the apostate belongs to a lay or non-exempt religious congregation, either papal or diocesan, male or female. The vicar general is competent to absolve from this censure even without a special commission (can. 198).

2. Such apostates are furthermore debarred ipso facto from all legitimate ecclesiastical acts, according to can. 2256, n. 2.

3. They are, moreover, ipso facto deprived of all the privileges granted to their order or congregation, but not of the privileges of the clerical state.

4. If they return, they remain forever deprived of the active and passive vote, and therefore cannot licitly[6] vote or be candidates for any elective office. If such a one is desired for an office, he can not be elected, but

[6] See can. 167.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google must be postulated, according to can. 179, and in the petition the reason would have to be stated. If a dispensation were granted, we think it would also restore the right to the active vote.

5. They must, in proportion to the seriousness of the case or the gravity of their offence, be punished with other penalties by their superiors, who are in this case bound by the constitutions. A decree of the S. Congregation of the Council[7] admonishes bishops to seek out such unfortunates and return them to their superiors, and exhorts the latter to receive them with paternal kindness.

Formerly such apostates had to do public penance, were excommunicated and forbidden to exercise any clerical office. If a monk received any sacred order during the time of his apostasy, he needed an Apostolic dispensation to exercise its functions.[8] A peculiar penalty was decreed by Paul IV: apostates from any order or congregation had to wear a black biretta with two white stripes running around its whole circumference.[9] But this was abolished by Pius IV.[10]

It may be added that a religious institute cannot be held responsible for debts contracted by apostate or fugitive religious.[11]

FUGITIVE RELIGIOUS

Can. 2386

Religiosus fugitivus ipso facto incurrit in privationem officii, si quod in religione habeat, et in sus-

7 Sept. 21, 1624, § 4, 5 (Richter, Trid., p. 433, n. 21).

8 Cc. 1-3, C. 20, q. 3; c. 69, Dist. 50; c. 6, X, V, 9.

9 "Postquam," July 20, 1558, § 6.

10 "Sedis Apostolicae," April 3, 1560, § 3.

11 Lezzana, l. c., n. 19; can. 536.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

pensionem proprio Superiori maiori reservatam, si sit in sacris; cum autem redierit, puniatur secundum constitutiones, et si constitutiones nihil de hoc caveant, Superior maior pro gravitate culpae poenas infligat.

Fugitive religious, according to can. 644, § 3 are such as leave a religious house without the permission of their superior, but with the intention of returning. It does not matter whether such a one leaves with or without the religious habit.[1] The difference between apostasy and flight consists in the intention.

1. A fugitive religious ipso facto

a) Loses any office he may hold in his institute, whether that office be high or low. Hence a higher superior, a conventual prior or prioress, an assistant, procurator, or procuratrix, porter or portress, those who hold a pastoral office in the name of their organization, i. e., a parish fully incorporated into the monastery (not a secular benefice or office) — all lose their office if they withdraw from obedience.

b) If the fugitive is a cleric in higher orders, he incurs suspension reserved to the major superior of the institute (can. 488, n. 8).

Note that these penalties are latae sententiae and, therefore, per se, require a declaratory sentence only under the circumstances mentioned in can. 2223, § 4.

1 S. C. C., Sept. 21, 1624, § 4 (l. c.); Lezzana, l. c., p. 188, n. 7. Whether the flight is accomplished by day or by night is immaterial. If expositi, i. e., religious who hold an office outside the religious house, leave their post or trust, they cannot strictly be called fugitives. (Suarez, De Relig., tr. VIII, l. III, c. 1. ed. Paris., 1860, t. XVI, p. 278). However, if they withdraw from the obedience due to their superiors for more than one month, they would have to be considered apostates. In this case the essential point is withdrawal from obedience.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

The suspension here understood is the general one of can. 2278, § 2.

2. In case of the fugitive's return, he shall be punished according to the respective constitutions, and if these contain nothing on the matter, the major superiors shall inflict fit penalties in proportion to the gravity of the fault. Here, too, it must be observed that local Ordinaries and religious superiors should strive to bring fugitives back to their religious houses.[2]

Both canons 2385 and 2386 suppose a return, and distinguish two kinds of penalties: a severer one for the act itself, and a milder one after the culprit's return. Does the penalty established for the mere act of apostasy or flight cease after the culprit's return? By no means. For censures cannot be removed except by absolution, and vindictive penalties are removed only by dispensation. Both, however, should be imparted soon after the culprit's return, whilst the other penalties, which are preceptive, are to be inflicted according to the constitutions or the prudent judgment of the superior, who, however, is not at liberty to let the culprit go entirely unpunished, because penal measures are intended for the public welfare and the protection of discipline.

PROFESSION VOID BY REASON OF DECEIT

Can. 2387

Religiosus clericus cuius professio ob admissum ab ipso dolum nulla fuerit declarata, si sit in minoribus ordinibus constitutus, e statu clericali abiiciatur; si in maioribus, ipso facto suspensus manet, donec Sedi Apostolicae aliter visum fuerit.

2 S. C. C., Sept. 21, 1624, § 4 (l. c.)

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A profession may be invalid for any one of the reasons stated in can. 542, n. 1. Besides, can. 572, § 1, n. 4, expressly states that dolus[1] (fraud or deceit) on the part of the candidate invalidates a religious profession. Therefore, if a candidate deliberately concealed any of the reasons stated in can. 542, n. 1, his profession would be invalid. The respective constitutions may also contain an invalidating impediment, for instance, a certain disease, especially of an incurable kind, like consumption, epilepsy, etc. If the religious is afflicted with such a defect and conceals it, his profession is invalid.[2] The declaration of nullity, in the last instance, belongs to the S. Congregation of Religious.

A religious whose profession has been declared null and void on account of deceit admitted by him shall be punished as follows:

1. If he is a cleric with minor orders, he is to be cast out from the clerical state, but he may be readmitted as a lay brother, provided he repeats the novitiate and makes a new profession. This penalty is ferendae sententiae, and, therefore, requires a trial and a condemnatory or declaratory sentence, after the fact is verified.

2. If he is a cleric in higher orders, he is ipso facto suspended until the Apostolic See shall have made provision for him. The Pontifical Commission for the Interpretation of the Code has decided that canons 2386, 2387, and 2389 must also be applied to delinquent members of religious associations (can. 673), provided they lead a life in common and are of clerical rank.[3]

1 "Dolus proprie sumptus importat iniuriam in decipiendo, et effectum seu damnum illatum per talem iniuriam, seu errorem seu ignorantiam"; Suarez De Voto, tr. VI, l. I, c. 11, n. 4 (t. XIV, 793). It is the injury caused by deceit which produces, if nothing else, i. e., no material damage, at least error or ignorance, which in itself is an evil.

2 S. C. C., July 6, 1726 (Richter, Trid., p. 426 ff. n. 14).

3 June 2-3, 1918, n. VI (A. Ap. S., X, 347).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

MARRIAGE ATTEMPTED BY CLERICS AND RELIGIOUS

Can. 2388

§ 1. Clerici in sacris constituti vel regulares aut moniales post votum sollemne castitatis, itemque omnes cum aliqua ex praedictis personis matrimonium etiam civiliter tantum contrahere praesumentes, incurrunt in excommunicationem latae sententiae Sedi Apostolicae simpliciter reservatam; clerici praeterea, si moniti, tempore ab Ordinario pro adiunctorum diversitate praefinito, non resipuerint, degradentur, firmo praescripto can. 188, n. 5.

§ 2. Quod si sint professi votorum simplicium perpetuorum tam in Ordinibus quam in Congregationibus religiosis, omnes, ut supra, excommunicatio tenet latae sententiae Ordinario reservata.

By ecclesiastical law clerics in higher orders, i. e., from subdeaconship onward, and regulars or nuns with solemn vows, cannot validly contract an ecclesiastical marriage,[1] and the Church consequently looks upon such marriages as mere "attempts." There must be a genuine attempt at matrimony to incur the penalty stated in this canon; mere concubinage is not sufficient. A valid marriage presupposes mutual consent, a certain form, and freedom from diriment impediments. There is only one form, viz.: marriage before a Catholic minister and at least two witnesses, which Catholics are obliged to observe under pain of nullity.[2] Therefore, if they

1 We say: an ecclesiastical marriage, because the civil law, in most countries, does not debar them from contracting a civil marriage. See canons 1072 and 1073; this Commentary, Vol. V, pp. 187 ff.

2 See can. 1094, 1099.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

would contract marriage before a non-Catholic minister it would be null and void by reason of lack of the prescribed form. Yet even in that case the censure would not be incurred, for it would be a species of civil marriage,[3] which is possible in our country, because non-Catholic ministers can and do perform the ceremony in the name of the law. Another possibility of complying with the form would be that mentioned in can. 1098. Besides, it might happen that the Catholic minister would be deceived. Otherwise the probability of clerics observing the required form would be exceedingly small.

The consent must be given internally as well as externally, and is generally presumed after puberty.[4] The question arises: May this consent coexist together with the knowledge or belief that the marriage will be void? For instance, if the contracting parties would, besides the impediment of sacred orders (celibacy) or vow, suffer from affinity or consanguinity, could they have real consent? The Code (can. 1085) expressly states the affirmative. The censure, therefore, would be incurred even under this knowledge of nullity,[5] provided it was directed to a matrimonial relation, and not merely to a concubinage.

It may also be asked whether the censure would be incurred if the marriage were null and void, not from a mere diriment impediment, but also from lack of consent. D'Annibale[6] and others deny that the censure would follow such a fictitiously attempted marriage. This opinion is acceptable because consent is no doubt the essential element of marriage. But trouble might

3 S. O., Dec. 22, 1880 ad 1 (Coll. P. F., n. 1544).

4 See can. 1082; this Commentary, Vol. V, pp. 223 f.

5 S. O., Jan. 13, 1892, ad 5 (Coll. P. F., n. 1777).

6 Comment., 1894; p. 101, n. 157; Lehmkuhl, II, 969.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

arise in the external forum, which presumes internal consent whenever external consent is given.[7] Hence in the external forum a marriage is supposed to exist if there is a semblance (figura et species) of matrimony, as is the case, e. g., in a civil marriage, i. e., one contracted before a civil magistrate without the prescribed ecclesiastical forum. This no doubt is generally the case where persons forbidden by ecclesiastical law attempt to contract marriage. But the Code lays under censure also the party who contracts with one forbidden to marry. This is a relative impediment, following the individual character of the matrimonial contract. Our text, then, states:

1. Clerics in higher orders, and regulars or nuns with solemn vows of chastity, who presume to contract a marriage, even though it be only a civil one, and

2. All those who presume to contract such a marriage with one of the aforesaid persons,

3. Incur excommunication latae sententiae, simply reserved to the Apostolic See.

4. Clerics who, after a canonical warning, do not retrace the step within the time set by the Ordinary. (a) forfeit all the offices they may hold, just as if they had formally resigned, for which no further declaration is required; and (b) shall be degraded, which requires a condemnatory, or at least a declaratory, sentence, after the term set in the canonical warning has expired.

Note that the penalty is incurred[8] only after solemn profession and that the profession must be valid and

7 See can. 2200, § 2.

8 Therefore those members of the Society of Jesus who have made only simple vows, although these produce for them the same effect, in this regard, as the solemn vows (Gregory XIII, "Ascendente," May 25, 1584) do not incur the penalty; D'Annibale, l. c., n. 156.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

the vow absolute and pronounced after the temporary vows had been taken.[9]

The term "praesumentes" supposes full knowledge and deliberation. Knowledge is here directed to the fact that the marriage is null and void and contrary to ecclesiastical law. It also supposes knowledge of the penalty.[10] Therefore supine or crass ignorance would excuse one from incurring the censure. This ignorance would have to be directed to the fact that the marriage was (supposedly) contracted and that it is null and void. This is true also concerning another hypothesis. It may be that the parties concerned did not realize the nullity of their marriage at the moment they contracted it, but learned of its nullity afterwards, and continued their matrimonial or rather concubinarian relation. Even in this case the censure would not be contracted.[11] But it must be added that in clerics and religious such ignorance is almost impossible, unless their mental condition be impaired.[12] On the other hand it is not impossible that they should doubt and gradually persuade themselves that their ordination or profession was not according to law, or defective, or invalid. Consequently, they may also deem their marriage valid. Much easier is it to assume ignorance in the other contracting party, who is not bound by the ties of the clerical state or vow. However, even there affected ignorance would not excuse.[13] Deliberation requires freedom of the will, which is certainly impaired by grave fear. Therefore it is commonly held [14] that grave fear (metus gravis) excuses one

9 See can. 574, § 1; can. 1309.

10 Can. 2229, § 2.

11 Avanzini, n. 39; Pennacchi, l. c., II, p. 24.

12 Hollweck, l. c., § 230, p. 300, note 4.

13 The affectata, admitted by Pennacchi (II, p. 23) can no longer be defended on account of can. 2229, § 1.

14 Pennacchi, l. c., II, p. 22 f.; D'Annibale, l. c., p. 101, n. 157.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google from censure. Grave fear may be caused by serious threats of imprisonment or death, no matter whence they come, provided it is inflicted for the purpose of contracting this particular marriage.[15] Even clerics and religious may be subjected to such threats.

§ 2 of can. 2388 sets forth the penalty for religious with simple perpetual vows. This penalty is excommunication latae sententiae, reserved to the Ordinary. "Ut supra," says the text; therefore:

1. All religious who have taken simple perpetual vows incur this excommunication;

2. Also those who contract a marriage with one perpetually professed,—

3. Provided, however, they presume to contract such a marriage, according to what was said on presumption.

In regular orders the lay brothers or lay sisters generally pronounce simple perpetual vows, which can now only be taken after temporary vows lasting at least three years (can. 574, § 1).

In congregations, either papal or diocesan, all the members, even though their institute be exempt (like that of the Passionists and that of the Redemptorists), pronounce only simple vows after the temporary vows.

The other penalties, i. e., loss of office and degradation, are not to be applied to these.

The Ordinary to whom the censure is reserved, is the local Ordinary with regard to non-exempt clerical institutes and nuns with solemn vows; with regard to members of exempt clerical institutes the Ordinary is the competent religious superior major.

[15] See can. 1087, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

VIOLATIONS OF COMMUNITY LIFE

Can. 2389

Religiosi legem vitae communis constitutionibus praescriptae in re notabili violantes, graviter moneantur et, emendatione non secuta, puniantur etiam privatione vocis activae et passivae et, si Superiores sint, etiam officii.

Can. 594 insisted upon community life for all religious. Here we have the penal sanction of this law, which provides that:

1. Religious who in a serious matter transgress the law of common life prescribed by their Constitutions shall be earnestly warned. This warning may be first paternal and then canonical, according to can. 2307, in order to serve as juridical basis for further procedure;

2. If no amendment follows, the culprits shall be deprived of the active and the passive vote, and

3. If they are superiors, they shall also be deprived of their office.

We need not add more than a few remarks to what we have said elsewhere on this subject.[1]

a) A res notabilis is a matter intrinsically or extrinsically serious. A matter is intrinsically important or serious if it is of great weight in preserving discipline or the special purpose of the respective institute. Thus the peculium seriously affects the whole religious life, especially of the Mendicant Orders. Thus also the choir service might seriously impair institutes which have solemn divine office for their main or chief object, as the Benedictines.

1 See Vol. III of this Commentary p. 303 ff.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

A matter is extrinsically serious if it is apt to have grave consequences, e. g., by reason of the influence of the transgressor.

That superiors are not exempt, nay liable to severer punishment than inferiors, is evident from our text. This holds good also as to the common table and the vow of poverty. The latter binds the superiors as well as their subjects. Therefore, says a decree of Clement VIII, they are not allowed to retain anything, either movable or immovable, for their own person, neither can they give permission to anyone to possess anything of whatsoever kind for himself. As to the common table, the same decree says that all, including the superiors, should be satisfied with the same quantity and quality of food and wine, unless excused by infirmity.[2] This decree is merely a further declaration of the Tridentine decree,[3] and was again embodied in a decree of the S. C. Concilii.[4]

The penalty is (ferendae sententiae) privation of the active and the passive vote as well as of office. Superiors therefore should issue a canonical warning, and after that proves ineffective, must inflict the penalty, which is preceptive (can. 2223).

If the superiors are delinquent, the local Ordinary is the competent authority to proceed in case of non-exempt religious, according to can. 618. In case of exempt religious, the local Ordinary should paternally admonish the superior, and if he does not obtain the desired result, report to the Holy See, as per can. 617.

2 "Nullus omnino," July 25, 1599. § 2, 4 (Bull. Luxemburg., III, 891). The law of residence also concerns superiors (can. 508) and belongs to community life.

3 Trid., Sess. 25, c. 2, de reg.

4 S. C. C., Sept. 24, 1624, § 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

This canon also applies to members and superiors of societies that do not take the three vows, but lead a common life, for instance, the Fathers of the Precious Blood.[5]

[5] Commissio Pont., June 2-3, 1918 (A. Ap. S., X, 347).

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE XVIII

CRIMES COMMITTED IN CONFERRING, RECEIVING, AND RELINQUISHING ECCLESIASTICAL DIGNITIES, OFFICES, AND BENEFICES

This entire Title concerns a purely ecclesiastical matter. The preliminary notions are supposed from former titles, especially from Book II, Title IV, on ecclesiastical offices, also Title IV, on benefices, as well as from the particular canons on special obligations, like the oath of Cardinals, the blessing of abbots, and the profession of faith.

VIOLATION OF THE FREEDOM OF ELECTIONS

Can. 2390

§ 1. Libertatem electionum ecclesiasticarum quovis modo per se vel per alios impedientes, vel electores aut electum, peracta canonica electione, propter eam quoquo modo gravantes, pro modo culpae puniantur.

§ 2. Quod si electioni a collegio clericorum vel religiosorum peragendae, laici vel saecularis potestas sese illegitime, contra libertatem canonicam, immiscere praesumpserint, electores qui hanc immixtionem sollicitaverint vel sponte admiserint, ipso facto privati sunt pro ea vice iure eligendi; qui vero suae electioni taliter factae scienter consenserit, fit ad officium vel beneficium, de quo agitur, ipso facto inhabilis.

This canon protects the liberty of elections in general

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(§ 1) and particularly against unlawful interference by the secular power (§ 2).

§ 1 has two clauses. The first regards freedom before or at election. Those, it says, who in any way, either themselves or through others, impede the freedom of ecclesiastical elections, shall be punished according to the gravity of their guilt.

a) Ecclesiastical elections are those mentioned in canons 160 ff., especially of bishops, abbots nullius or prelates nullius, abbots or superiors of religious (also female) institutes, of the vicar capitular or administrator, of synodal examiners, judges and pastors consultors.[1]

An election, according to our Code, may take place by balloting or by compromise. It is also generally taught that postulation, presentation, and nomination were intended by the Decretal [2] from which our text is taken.[2] The scope of this canon no doubt is to safeguard the freedom of the Church.

b) Freedom is required, because it is essential, as for every truly human act, so especially for such transactions as depend on the choosing of a fit or worthy superior. Hence any contrary custom is styled a corruption.[3]

c) The freedom of election may be endangered in many ways, e. g., by violence, serious threats, grave fear, deceit, directly or indirectly.[4]

d) The undue influence may be exerted by the persons themselves who endeavor to impede the electors, or through intermediary agents, including mandantes. Thus the voters themselves may be the executioners of the will

1 See can. 329, § 3; 321; 432; 506; 385; 1574. As to the papal election see can. 166 or "Vacante Sede."

2 C. 12, 6°, I, 6, de electione.

3 Cfr. Schmalzgrueber, I, 6, n. 67; Maschat-Geraldi, Institutiones Canonicae, 1, 6, n. 17 (ed. Venet., 1760, I, 237).

3 C. 14. X. I, 6.

4 See can. 169, and this Commentary, Vol. II, p. 133.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of one who is by right excluded from asserting any influence in the election. The Decretals mention especially blood relations.[5] But other relatives, friends, pastors, chaplains — who sometimes exert more power than the law or their office permits — also Ordinaries and religious superiors may become guilty of such interference.

Those who on account of the result, in any way vex the voters or the elected candidate after the canonical election has been completed, shall be punished according to the gravity of their guilt. This vexation may be exercised by malicious defamation, withdrawal of support, material damage, or bodily injury. But these molestations must be inspired by the result of the election, which is here supposed to have taken place in a canonical way. If the vexations were inspired by personal spite or family reasons, the crime would not be verified. The persons aimed at by these vexations are the voters and the person elected by them, and no one else.[6]

The penalty, which according to the Decretals was excommunication latae sententiae, is now arbitrary but preceptive (can. 2223).

§ 2 concerns unlawful interference by the lay or secular power with the elections of clerical or religious bodies. The interference, to fall under this canon, must be directed against canonical freedom. It may consist of any act that is injurious to the freedom of the election. Thus it would be against canonical election if a layman would be freely and spontaneously admitted to cast his vote,[7] or if the magistrate, no matter what his name or title, would be asked for permission to hold the election, or to cast a vote for a certain person;[8] or if any lay or

5 C. 12, X, 6°, I, 6.
6 Eichmann, l. c., p. 219.
7 C. 28, Dist. 63.
8 Cc. 14, 43, X, I, 6.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

secular power were present under the pretext of safeguarding the election.[9]

The penalty does not concern those who unjustly interfere,[10] but

a) The electors who either solicit or spontaneously admit such interference. Consequently, if the lay power threatens or creates grave fear in the minds of the electors, the penalty is not incurred.[11] The voters are by this canon deprived ipso facto of the right of ballot, but only for this one time (pro ea vice), i. e., for the election or ballot to be cast after this election, which is invalid on account of unlawful interference.

b) The person unlawfully elected, if he knowingly consents to an election held under such circumstances, is ipso facto unfit for the office or benefice to which he has been elected with the interference of the lay power. Knowledge (can. 2229, § 2) here means being aware of the lay interference, not of the penalty. The inability is restricted to the one elective office or benefice which was to be conferred — quoad ius ad rem — by this one invalid election. Since the text says: office or benefice, not only dignities[12] are intended, but any office or benefice, even that of a religious superioress and her assistant or secretary, where such officers are elected.

If the lay interference were sanctioned by a special and express agreement of the secular power with the Church, as, e. g., a concordat, it would not be unlawful.[13] Neither is the prohibition of lay interference here to be understood as applying to elections performed by laymen, 9 Cfr. Maschat, l. c.; Schmalzgrueber, I, 16, n. 69.

10 The election would be null and void; see can. 166.

11 C. 43, X, I, 6; Schmalzgrueber, l. c., n. 68.

12 C. 43, X, I, 6 only mentions dignities (see Hollweck, l. c., p. 309, § 241, note 4); but our text is wider.

13 Maschat, l. c., I, 6, n. 17; Schmalzgrueber, l. c., n. 69.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

as, for instance, in cases where they lawfully elect a pastor[14]; for the text explicitly says: an election held by a clerical or a religious body.

ELECTION, NOMINATION OR PRESENTATION OF UNWORTHY CANDIDATES; NON-OBSERVANCE OF ESSENTIAL FORMALITIES

Can. 2391

§ 1. Collegium quod indignum scienter elegerit, ipso acto privatur pro ea vice iure ad novam electionem procedendi.

§ 2. Singuli vero electores qui substantialem electionis formam scienter non servaverint, possunt pro gravitate culpae ab Ordinario puniri.

§ 3. Clerici vel laici qui indignum scienter praesentaverint vel nominaverint, iure praesentandi vel nominandi ipso facto pro ea vice carent.

This canon contains two specifically distinct enactments: one directed towards the person elected, presented, or nominated (§§ 1 and 3), the other concerning the essential formalities of election (§ 2).

§ 1. A college that has knowingly elected an unworthy candidate, is ipso facto deprived, for that time, of the right of proceeding to a new election.

1. A college is the elective body as such, i. e., as a body, and therefore the penalty falls upon the members of this body, as such. Such a body would be a cathedral chapter or a group of religious endowed with the right of electing their superior. But it may also be a congregation, according to can. 455; because the text does not say: a college of clerics or religious.

14 Can. 455.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

2. Who is unworthy (indignus)? The Code uses the term idoneus almost exclusively to signify a fit person.[1] Here it employs the word indignus. Is unfit and unworthy the same? According to a Decretal[2] it would seem that the words indignus and inidoneus have the same meaning. Worthy (dignus) is the one who possesses the necessary qualifications, as prescribed by law, and also the necessary competency for the office in question. Unworthy (indignus) is he who lacks one or the other qualification required by law.[3] These definitions, however, seem to apply to fit and unfit just as well, and therefore some other element is plainly required to render the distinction more adequate.

Dignus includes juridical as well as moral qualities, or, in other words, it combines the strictly technical qualifications prescribed for an office by law with moral fitness or equipment; or, perhaps, still better, he is worthy who possesses all the qualities positively prescribed by law and is without the negative qualities that render one unworthy of holding a benefice. The latter are, for instance, excommunication, interdict, suspension, deprivation of the passive vote, infamy, etc.[4] Therefore we may say that dignus includes idoneus, but adds to it moral aptitude for the respective office.

But is this the meaning of indignus in our text? We believe it is. For indignus here cannot simply mean non-idoneus, since a person who is not-fit on account of 1 See can. 153, § 2; 331; 399 (aptiores); 434; 435; 504 (inhabiles).

2 C. 29, X, III, 5.

3 Reiffenstuel, I, 6, n. 204, Schmalzgrueber, I, 6, n. 15, also assumes dignitas to be identical with idoneitas, under three headings: aetatis maturitas, gravitas morum et litterarum scientia; the gravitas morum he distinguishes into two defects or rather absence thereof: rimen et aliud impedimentum canonicum, among the latter censures; but these might just as well be referred to crimes.

4 See can. 2265, § 1; 2275; 2283; 2291, n. 11; 2294.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

a merely technical law, can still be postulated.[5] Thus, for instance, a religious who is too young to be elected to an office, according to can. 504, can be postulated for that office. Thus a mother general who has served two successive terms, must now be postulated for a third by the S. Congregation of Religious.[6] But no one can proclaim her "unworthy" on that account. The same appears from the quotations appended to our canon by Card. Gasparri. Thus a dean of a cathedral chapter was elected vicar-capitular, but his election was annulled not only on account of irregularities, but also because he was under suspension ex informata conscientia.[7]

3. If, then, the electors elect one whose unworthiness is known to them, they are, for this time only, deprived of the right to proceed to a new election. This supposes that the first election was invalid and, therefore, null and void.

The next question is: How is the invalidity of an election to be ascertained? If an invalid election needs ratification by the superior or presiding officer, it is his business to declare that it is invalid. After this is done, the electors who knowingly voted for an unworthy candidate, are deprived of the right of proceeding to a new election, and the superior who is entitled to confirm or ratify is authorized to elect another, according to can. 178. If for one reason or another the superior should decline to exercise this right, he may return it to the college, and in this case the whole college would again be entitled to vote.[8]

If the election,———for instance, of a vicar capitular

[5] Thus also Eichmann, l. c., p. 220 f.

[6] S. C. Rel., March 9, 1920 (Am. Eccl. Rev., Vol. 63, p. 498 ff.).

[7] S. C. C., Nov. 4, 1722 (Richter, Trid., p. 370, n. 2).

[8] Eichmann, l. c., p. 221.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(can. 438), ——— requires no ratification, the fact of the unworthiness of the candidate must be ascertained by either a declaratory or a condemnatory sentence, or must at least be notorious. Such a declaration would have to be issued by the presiding officer or in the form of a protest from the innocent members, and in this case we believe that the innocent members, though in the minority, could proceed to the election immediately (in continenti).[9]

§ 2. Individual electors who knowingly fail to observe the essential formalities, may be punished by the Ordinary in proportion to their guilt. Essential formalities, according to our Code, are:

a) The calling of all the chapter members; if more than one-third has not been called, the election is invalid (can. 162, § 3);

b) The election of two tellers and the secret collection of the votes,

c) The publication of the votes and comparing them with the number of electors,

d) The proclamation of the election and the elected (see canons 171 and 174).

If any one of these formalities was omitted, though the electors, or at least some of them, knew of the necessity of observing them, the guilty ones may be punished.[10] This punishment is facultative.

§ 3. Clerics or laymen who knowingly present or nominate an unworthy person for office, are ipso facto de-

9 Reiffenstuel, I, 6, n. 260.

10 We suppose by him who is entitled to ratify the election, generally the superior; thus the local ordinary may punish religious at whose elections he presides; the provincial or president may punish the electors regular. The Sacred C. of Religious, to which the acts in some cases must be forwarded, would also be competent.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

prived of the right of presentation or nomination, for this one time.

To what was said above concerning indigni nothing need be added except that it is easier for laymen than for clerics to plead ignorance as an excuse. The ea vice must be understood as stated above. As soon as the Pope or bishop has rejected the unworthy person and selected another, the punishment ceases, and the electors may again nominate or present a candidate.

SIMONY IN ECCLESIASTICAL OFFICES, BENEFICES, AND DIGNITIES

Can. 2392

Firmo praescripto can. 729, delictum perpetrantes simoniae in quibuslibet officiis, beneficiis aut dignitatibus ecclesiasticis:

1°. Incurrunt in excommunicationem latae sententiae Sedi Apostolicae simpliciter reservatam;

2°. Ipso facto privati in perpetuum manent iure eligendi, praesentandi, nominandi, si quod habeant;

3°. Si clerici sint, praeterea suspendantur.

The crime of simony, so heartily detested by the Church, has been previously mentioned in connection with penal laws.[1] What it is and how far it extends has been clearly explained. Can. 729 renders any simoniacal provision of offices, benefices, or dignities null and void.[2] This enactment is here repeated. Consequently any simoniacal election, postulation, nomination, presentation is null and void ipso iure. Besides, any

1 See can. 2324, 2327, 2371.

2 Except the papal election; see can. 160 and "Vacante Sede."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

simoniacal appointment to, or exchange of, offices, benefices or dignities, or any simoniacal alienation or advowson or payment for appointment or presentation, retention of, or agreement to pay, revenues or parts thereof, also parochial concursus — are illegal and subject to punishment.[3] Not included is real simony practiced for the purpose of entering the religious state.

Simony, as here intended, not only includes real (realis), but also confidential or conventional simony, provided it be not purely mental. The present canon decrees that those who commit the crime of simony in any ecclesiastical office, benefice or dignity:

1. Incur the excommunication latae sententiae simply reserved to the Apostolic See, and

2. Are ipso facto deprived forever of the right electing, presenting, or nominating, if they possess that right.

3. If the perpetrators are clerics, they should also be suspended.

The last-named penalty is ferendae sententiae, but preceptive (can. 2223), and the suspension is general (can. 2278, § 2).

NEGLECT OF RATIFICATION OR INSTITUTION

Can. 2393

Omnes qui iure eligendi, praesentandi vel nominandi legitime fruuntur, si, neglecta auctoritate illius cui confirmatio vel institutio competit, officium, beneficium aut dignitatem ecclesiasticam conferre prae-

[3] See X, V, 3; c. 2, Extrav. Comm., V, 1; Pius IV, "Romanum Pontificem," Oct. 17, 1564; Pius V, "Cum primum," April 1, 1566; "Quanta Ecclesiae," April 1, 1568; "Intolerabilis," June 1, 1569; N. Garzia, De Beneficiis Ecclesiasticis, P. VIII, c. 1 (ed. Venet., 1630, Vol. II, p. 131 ff.).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sumpserint, suo iure pro ea vice ipso facto privati manent.

One who is elected and requires ratification (confirmatio), must ask for this confirmation according to can. 177, § 1; one who has been postulated, must ask to be admitted according to can. 181, § 1; one who has been nominated or presented, needs institution according to can. 148, § 1. These acts are here understood, not the institutio corporalis or installatio.[1] The Code says: Those legitimately endowed with the right of electing, presenting, or nominating, if they presume to confer an ecclesiastical office, benefice, or dignity by setting aside the authority of the one who is entitled to ratify the election (respectively, to admit postulation) or to grant institution, are ipso iure deprived of their right for this one time.

Here dolus, or rather ignorance and lack of deliberation, is pre-supposed. The reason for this penalty lies in the fact that by the act of election, or nomination, or presentation, one acquires only a ius ad rem, i. e., not a full right, but merely a claim to the office, benefice, or dignity, whilst the actual preferment is granted by those who enjoy the right of confirmation or institution. Neglect to seek ratification or institution is, therefore, a perversion of the real act of preferment and a slur on the proper authority.[2]

1 Eichmann, l. c., p. 225 is wrong in mentioning this.

2 See c. 23, X, I, 6 (postulation); c. 2, X, I, 10 (advowson of regulars).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

ILLEGALLY TAKING POSSESSION OF ECCLESIASTICAL OFFICES, ETC.

Can. 2394

Qui beneficium, officium vel dignitatem ecclesiasticam propria auctoritate occupaverit vel, ad ea electus, praesentatus, nominatus in eorundem possessionem vel regimen seu administrationem sese ingesserit, antequam necessarias litteras confirmationis vel institutionis acceperit easque illis ostenderit, quibus de iure debet:

1°. Sit ipso iure ad eadem inhabilis et praeterea ab Ordinario pro gravitate culpae puniatur;

2°. Per suspensionem, privationem beneficii, officii, dignitatis antea obtentae et, si res ferat, etiam per depositionem, cogatur a beneficii, officii, dignitatis occupatione eorumque regimine vel administratione statim, monitione praemissa, recedere;

3°. Capitula vero, conventus aliique omnes ad quos spectat, huiusmodi electos, praesentatos vel nominatos ante litterarum exhibitionem admittentes, ipso facto a iure eligendi, nominandi vel praesentandi suspensi maneant ad beneplacitum Sedis Apostolicae.

This canon distinguishes two different ways of taking possession: the corporalis institutio (can. 1443, § 2) for offices or benefices of free appointment, and the assumption of offices to which a claim has been obtained by election, nomination, or presentation. The offices or benefices to which one is freely appointed are taken possession of by bodily institution or installation, which is reserved to the local Ordinary. This last in the series of appointive acts presupposes actual appointment or ius in re. However, as can. 1443, § 1, says, no one should take possession of a benefice conferred on him on his own authority.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Those elected, presented, or nominated, need letters of confirmation or institution, which they must obtain from the proper authority and show to those who are entitled to see them. Thus a bishop elected and confirmed must show the bulls to the chapter or consultors,[1] before he can take possession of, govern, or administer his diocese.

1. Those who act contrary to this law are ipso iure rendered incapable of holding the office, benefice, or dignity in question and, besides, shall be punished by the Ordinary in proportion to the gravity of their fault. Consistorial as well as non-consistorial, secular as well as religious, residential and non-residential, curata and non-curata benefices are comprised in this law.[2] But the office, benefice, or dignity must have been actually obtained, because the appointment is supposed to have been made, the election ratified and the nomination and presentation accepted.

In our country the installation of pastors is not always performed; and, consequently, this canon does not concern pastors in dioceses where this formality is usually omitted. But the other clause concerning the papal letters for prelatical offices also holds here.[3] The penalty is vindictive, but latae sententiae, and therefore needs a dispensation from the superior to whom the installation

1 See can. 334, § 3; 293, § 2; 312, § 1; 322, § 1.

2 C. 5, 6° I, 6; c. 3, Extrav. Comm., I, 3; Innocent VIII, "Ad reformandum," 1485; Paul IV, "Incumbentia," Nov. I, 1557; Hollweck, l. c., 312, § 246.

3 Pius IX, "Romanus Pontifex," Aug. 28, 1873 (A. S. S., VII, 401).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

or ratification by right belongs, i. e., either the local Ordinary or the Pope.

2. By suspension from, or privation[4] of, the benefice, office, or dignity already obtained and, if necessary, even by deposition, must the culprit be compelled to give up his office, benefice, or dignity and immediately to relinquish the government and administration thereof; but this latter deposition, being ferendae sententiae, requires a canonical admonition (can. 2307).

3. Chapters, convents, and other communities that admit persons elected, presented, or nominated to the administration or government of an office, benefice, or dignity before the exhibition of the letters of appointment, remain ipso facto deprived of the right of electing, nominating, or presenting as long as it pleases the Apostolic See (ad beneplacitum Apostolicae Sedis).[5]

Aliique may mean any community or corporation that enjoys the right of election, e. g., a chapter under a prelate or abbot nullius.

ACCEPTANCE OF AN OFFICE NOT VACANT DE IURE

Can. 2395

Qui scienter acceptat collationem officii, beneficii vel dignitatis de iure non vacantis et patiatur se in eius possessionem immitti, sit ipso facto inhabilis ad illa

4 Privation is possible, because they really had a ius in re, not only ad rem.

5 "Apostolicae Sedis," V, 1: "Suspensionem ipso facto incurrunt a suorum Beneficiorum perceptione ad beneplacitum S. Sedis Capitula et conventus ecclesiarum et monasteriorum aliique omnes, qui ad illarum seu illorum regimen et administrationem recipiunt Episcopos aliosve Praelatos de praedictis ecclesiis seu monasteriis apud eandem S. Sedem quovis modo provisos, antequam ipsi exhibuerunt litteras apostolicas de sua promotione."

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

postea assequenda aliisque poenis pro modo culpae puniatur.

As we have explained elsewhere, an office may become vacant de iure or de facto or both ways.[1] It becomes vacant de iure if the title to it is lost, as per can. 183. An office must be vacant at least de iure to be legally conferred; any provision made otherwise is null and void (can. 150, § 1).

Our canon says:

Whoever knowingly accepts an appointment to an office, benefice, or dignity that is not vacant de iure and allows himself to be put in possession thereof, is rendered ipso facto incapable of obtaining this office, etc., afterwards and, besides, shall be punished otherwise in proportion to his guilt. Note the word scienter according to can. 2229, §2, and the copula et, which signifies that one permits himself to be illegally installed after having knowingly accepted an illegal appointment. The text, following the old law,[2] mentions actual appointment (collationem) and hence a mere promise of a benefice to become vacant in future is not forbidden.

RETENTION OF INCOMPATIBLE OFFICES

Can. 2396

Clericus, qui assecutus pacificam possessionem officii vel beneficii cum priore incompatibilis, prius quoque retinere praesumpserit contra praescriptum can. 156, 1439, utroque privatus ipso iure exsistat.

Concerning incompatible offices and benefices, consult

1 See Vol. II of this Commentary, p. 107.

2 C. 6, X, III, 8; Maschat, l. c., III, tit. 8, n. 5 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

canons 156 and 1439.[1] Note also that the second office or benefice must be peacefully possessed, i. e., there must be no litigation in connection with it. It supposes, therefore, not only appointment or preferment, but actual possession by bodily installation.

Therefore, the law punishes with the loss of both benefices a cleric who, having taken peaceful possession of another office or benefice incompatible with one already possessed by him, dares to retain both.

How soon this penalty is effective, the Code does not expressly state, but it may be deduced from the text. The word praesumpserit supposes a knowledge of the incompatibility of the two offices. The term assecutus (perfect) supposes tranquil possession. The moment these two conditions are verified, therefore, the penalty goes into effect. Formerly it was assumed that a month must have elapsed[2]; but the Code does not favor this assumption.

REFUSAL OF THE CARDINAL'S OATH

Can. 2397

Si quis ad dignitatem cardinalitiam promotus, iusiurandum, de quo in can. 234, emittere recusaverit, ipso facto cardinalitia dignitate privatus perpetuo maneat.

The duty of a cardinal is, as Sixtus V declared,[1] to assist the Vicar of Christ on earth by advice and collaboration in governing the Church. This naturally re-

1 See Vol. II of this Commentary, pp. 113 f.

2 Hollweck, l. c., p. 318, § 257, note 3; Reiffenstuel, III, 5, n. 338, rejects this view.

1 "Postquam," Dec. 3, 1586, § 19 (Bull. Luxemb., II, 611).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

quires personal presence, at least occasionally. Hence the same Pontiff ordered that no one absent from the Curia should be created a cardinal, or rather receive the red biretta, blessed by the Pope and transmitted by a special courier, unless he gives oath into the hands of an ecclesiastical dignitary that he will visit the Holy City within one year. A copy of this oath was to be immediately forwarded to the Pope. Then the penalty contained in our text is added: "If any one promoted to the cardinalate refuses to take this oath, he is ipso facto and forever deprived of the cardinalitial dignity." [2] No declaratory sentence is required.

NEGLECT OF EPISCOPAL CONSECRATION

Can. 2398

Si quis ad episcopatum promotus, contra praescriptum can. 333 intra tres menses consecrationem suscipere neglexerit, fructus non facit suos, fabricae ecclesiae cathedralis applicandos; et si postea in eadem negligentia per totidem menses perstiterit, episcopatu privatus ipso iure manet.

The Council of Chalcedon (451) and other synods [1] insisted upon the necessity of episcopal consecration for those called to the plenitude of sacerdotal power. Our canon is the sanction to can. 333. It provides that anyone promoted to the episcopacy, who neglects to receive the episcopal consecration within three months after receiving the Apostolic letters of appointment, is deprived of the 2 Said Constitution added that if the Cardinal does not come to Rome, the same penalty follows. But our text leaves that to the Pope to decide.

1 See c. 2, Dist. 75; c. 1, Dist. 100.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google revenues of his office, which are in that case to be applied to the building fund of the cathedral, not to the mensa episcopalis. This obligation becomes effective ninety days after date of the reception of the papal letter, and binds ex iustitia.

If the appointee neglects to receive the episcopal consecration for another term of three months, he is ipso facto deprived of the episcopal office,[2] without any further declaration. However, it appears to us that can. 2223, § 4, concerning the public weal, would find application here.

FORSAKING ONE'S POST

Can. 2399

Clerici maiores, munus a proprio Ordinario sibi commissum, sine eiusdem Ordinarii licentia, deserere praesumentes, suspendantur a divinis ad tempus ab Ordinario secundum diversos casus praefiniendum.

Not only the law of obedience, but also the residential or diocesan obligation and ordinary courtesy demand that a cleric stick to the position or post entrusted to him by his Ordinary.[1] The present canon is a sanction of can. 128. The munus intended comprises all kinds of offices with which a cleric may be entrusted. Only in case the clergyman had no "place" in the diocese and was not properly incardinated, would he be allowed to go elsewhere.[2] But even then he should at least ask for permission to leave.[3] Not to forsake the charge assigned means to "stick to it" as long as the bishop

2 Trid., Sess. 23, c. 2, de ref.
1 See can. 127, 128, 143.
2 S. C. C., Dec. 5, 1574 (Richter, Trid., p. 207, n. 3).
3 S. C. C., June 12, 1604 (ib.).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

deems it necessary. This obligation is attached to the office or charge, and even clerics who have been ordained on the title of their own patrimony are not exempt from this law.[4]

The text says: Clerics in higher orders, who without the Ordinary's permission, dare to relinquish a place or position assigned to them by their Ordinary, shall be suspended a divinis for a period to be determined by the Ordinary, as the case may require.

This vindictive penalty (can. 2298, n. 2) presupposes malice and knowledge of the evil consequences apt to follow such conduct. Resignation, if properly tendered and accepted (can. 190), does not establish the crime.

RESIGNATION OF AN ECCLESIASTICAL OFFICE INTO THE HANDS OF LAYMEN

Can. 2400

Clericus qui in manus laicorum officium, beneficium aut dignitatem ecclesiasticam resignare praesumpserit, ipso facto in suspensionem a divinis incurrit.

A cleric who dares to resign an ecclesiastical office, benefice, or dignity into the hands of laymen, ipso facto incurs suspension a divinis. Here the act of resignation itself is punished, and justly so, because, as ecclesiastical offices, etc., cannot be received from laymen, neither can they be resigned into their hands. The Decretals[1] from which our text is taken supposed that the clergyman received his office or benefice from laymen, and therefore pronounced privation.

4 Ibid.

1 C. 8, X, I, 9; Hollweck, l. c., p. 317, § 257. But our text does not suppose re-acceptance — only resignation.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 05:59 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Laymen are all persons not initiated into the clerical order, even though they be trustees or hold a so-called ecclesiastical office.[2] The offices here intended are all kinds of offices, either of election, or presentation, or nomination. Presumption, however, is supposed (can. 2229, § 2). The suspension is not reserved (see can. 2253, n. 1).

RETENTION OF OFFICE DESPITE PRIVATION OR REMOVAL

Can. 2401

Si quis in detinendo officio, beneficio, dignitate, non obstante legitima privatione aut remotione, persistat, aut ne ea dimittat, moras illegitime nectat, ea, praemissa monitione, deserere cogatur per suspensionem a divinis aliasve poenas, depositione, si res ferat, non exclusa.

By privation and removal legitimately decreed and inflicted, an office becomes vacant de iure and may therefore be conferred upon another person.[1] Thus one who holds two incompatible offices is deprived ipso iure (can. 2396) of both and they become vacant by law (can. 2396; see can. 156). A pastor, whether removable or irremovable, may be removed according to law, and in that case has to leave his pastoral residence as soon as possible.[2] If he continues to hang on to an office, benefice, or dignity, of which he has been lawfully deprived, or from which he has been removed, or if he sets up an unlawful opposition, he shall be (canonically) warned, and if the warning proves fruitless, compelled to leave the office,

2 Reiffenstuel I, 9, n. 5.
1 See can. 151; 183, § 1; 2298, n. 6; 2299, § 1, 3.
2 See can. 2147-2161.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

benefice or dignity, by suspension a divinis and, if necessary, by deposition.[3]

Morae illegitimae properly means unlawful delay caused in the execution of a sentence or decree. Lawful would be an appeal from the sentence of privation, which is a vindictive penalty, and also recourse from a decree of the Ordinary against removal (can. 2153). Pending an appeal or recourse, no canonical warning should be issued, because the text presupposes unlawful delay.

NEGLECT TO RECEIVE THE ABBATIAL BLESSING

Can. 2402

Abbas vel Praelatus nullius, qui contra praescriptum can. 322, § 2, benedictionem non receperit, est ipso facto a iurisdictione suspensus.

An abbot nullius or a prelate nullius who is required by an Apostolic mandate or by a statute of his institute to receive the abbatial blessing (to be imparted by a bishop) and neglects to receive it within three months from the date of receiving the Apostolic letters of appointment or confirmation, is ipso facto suspended from jurisdiction[1]; provided no lawful impediment prevented him from receiving the blessing.

NEGLECT OF PROFESSION OF FAITH

Can. 2403

Qui contra praescriptum can. 1406 fidei professionem

3 See c. un. Extrav. Joann. XXII, tit. III, c. 4; c. 4; Extrav. Comm., III, 4.

1 See can. 2278, § 2, n. 1.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sine iusto impedimento emittere negligat, moneatur, praefinito quoque congruo termino; quo transacto, contumax, etiam per privationem officii, beneficii, dignitatis, muneris, puniatur; nec interim beneficii, officii, dignitatis, muneris fructus facit suos.

Those who are obliged to make profession of faith are enumerated in can. 1406. This profession is distinct from the oath to be administered by the consecrating bishop to a bishop-elect, and therefore the oath cannot take the place of the profession[1] (can. 1406, § 1, n. 3). The Orientals, too, are bound to make this profession according to the newly prescribed formula.[2]

Our canon says that whoever, contrary to can. 1406, neglects to make profession of faith, unless prevented by lawful impediment,

1. Shall be warned canonically, a suitable time being granted within which he may comply with his obligation;

2. If he permits the fixed term to go by and stubbornly persists in his refusal, he shall be punished even by privation from office, benefice, dignity or charge, and

3. Meanwhile (i. e., as long as his contumacy lasts) he shall not be entitled to the income from his benefice, office, dignity, or charge and is, therefore, obliged to make restitution if he takes any part of it.

1 S. C. P. F., Jan. 10, 1875 (Coll., n. 1429). The iuramentum in the Pont. Rom., "De Consecratione Electi in Episcopum."

2 S. C. P. F., July 16, 1878 (ib. n. 1429), and the formula ib., Vol. II, 122 f.; the formula for the Latin Church, ib., p. 97 f.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

TITLE XIX

ABUSE OF ECCLESIASTICAL POWER OR OFFICE

This Title, too, per se, contains purely ecclesiastical matter, yet there are canons inserted here which may bring the Church into conflict with the civil power. Thus official documents may be abused and passed to persons for whom they are not intended. Ecclesiastical officials may be bribed and provoke a civil suit. All this is comprised under the general term abuse. Power refers to those who exercise either jurisdiction proper or domestic power, whilst office comprises every charge of public trust. It is precisely the abuse of public confidence and the damage accruing to public welfare that the Church wishes to prevent by these penal enactments.

ABUSE OF ECCLESIASTICAL POWER

Can. 2404

Abusus potestatis ecclesiasticae, prudenti legitimi Superioris arbitrio, pro gravitate culpae puniatur, salvo praescripto canonum qui certam poenam in aliquos abusus statuunt.

Abuse of ecclesiastical power shall be punished by the lawful superior according to his prudent judgment and in proportion to the gravity of the fault, with due regard, however, to the canons which inflict distinct penalties for certain abuses.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

There may be overzealous, or imprudent, or revengeful prelates, who are too ready to inflict penalties, especially censures, before they have lawful proofs against the culprit.[1] Then there is "the root of all evil," [2] avarice, which may prompt some to be too lenient in granting favors, absolutions, or dispensations,[3] or in meting out penalties. Another abuse of power would be to demand pecuniary contributions on the occasion of episcopal or canonical visitations.[4] Some abuses are especially singled out in the following canons, whilst others have already been mentioned, for instance, absolution without the necessary faculties (can. 2338) and conferring of orders (can. 2370, 2373).

TAMPERING WITH DIOCESAN DOCUMENTS

Can. 2405

Vicarius Capitularis aliive omnes, tam de Capitulo, quam extranei, qui documentum quodibet ad Curiam episcopalem pertinens sive per se sive per alium subtraxerint vel destruxerint vel celaverint vel substantialiter immutaverint, incurrunt ipso facto in excommunicationem Sedi Apostolicae simpliciter reservatam, et ab Ordinario etiam privatione officii, beneficii, plecti poterunt.

The reader will have noticed that the Code is very particular about official books and documents. The present canon sanctions by censure the enactments issued on this head.

1 C. 11, C. 2, q.: "excommunicare, antequam causa probetur."
2 I Tim. VI, 10.
3 C. 3, X, V, 37.
4 C. 2, 6° III, 20; Trid., Sess. 24, c. 3, de ref.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

1. The vicar capitular (our administrator during the vacancy of the episcopal see) as well as the members of the chapter (our diocesan consultors), as well as outsiders (for instance, the secretary or chancellor of the diocese, or other officials of whatever name or rank, clerics or laymen) incur the excommunication simply reserved to the Holy See:

2. If personally or through intermediary persons they withdraw, or destroy, or conceal, or substantially alter[1] any document belonging to the episcopal court, which certainly is identical with our diocesan court. By documents are understood the papers or entries mentioned in can. 1813, § 1; — but not only such as are issued by the diocesan officials and abstracts of which are kept in the diocesan archives, but also such as are sent to, or received by, the episcopal court; in other words, all documents which concern persons, property, or rights of the diocese, as, e. g., petitions, accusations, criminal and civil acts, dispensations, appointments, concursus and examination papers, establishments,[2] dedications, consecrations of churches and chapels, parishes and missions, inventories, deeds, abstracts, receipts, and also civil documents addressed to the diocesan court. Private letters, unless they bear on ecclesiastical as connected with civil or criminal procedure, do not belong to the diocesan court.

3. The penalty is ipso facto excommunication, simply reserved to the Apostolic See. Note that no presumption or knowledge or rashness is required (see can. 2229). Transgressors may furthermore be punished by the Ordinary by privation from office or benefice.

1 A substantial alteration may happen if the initials or the surname of a person are changed.

2 Also documents fixing boundaries, the distinction between removable and irremovable parishes, etc.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

PERFIDIOUS AND NEGLECTFUL HANDLING OF OFFICIAL DOCUMENTS

Can. 2406

§ 1. Quicunque officio tenetur acta vel documenta seu libros Curiarum ecclesiasticarum vel libros paroeciales conficiendi, conscribendi aut conservandi, si ea falsare, adulterare, destruere vel occultare praesumpserit, suo officio privetur aliisve gravibus poenis ab Ordinario pro modo culpae puniatur.

§ 2. Qui vero acta, documenta vel libros hos legitime petenti exscribere, transmittere seu exhibere dolose detrectaverit aliove quovis modo officium suum prodiderit, privatione officii vel suspensione ab eodem et mulcta ad arbitrium Ordinarii pro gravitate puniri potest.

§ 1. Whoever is obliged by his office to compile, write or keep records or documents of ecclesiastical courts or parochial books, shall be deprived of his office and be severely punished in proportion to his guilt by the Ordinary, if he dares to falsify, adulterate, destroy, or conceal any of these documents. This concerns especially chancellors and notaries, who have charge of diocesan and secret archives, and keep the records of ecclesiastical, civil and criminal trials, and also of trials for beatification.[1]

Administrators or the diocesan board of trustees are responsible for an accurate and faithful inventory of the documents and instruments relating to church property.[2]

1 See can. 375-378, also, for elections, can. 171, § 5; then, canons 1585; 1621-1625; 1645, § 2; 1811; 1874, § 5; 1946, § 2, n. 1; 2142; 2144.

2 See can. 1522; 1523, n. 6.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Those in charge of Mass stipends and Mass foundations must take good care of their books.[3]

Pastors are responsible for their parish books.[4] These are especially mentioned, whilst the records, documents, or books are supposed to belong to the "curia ecclesiastica," or ecclesiastical court. Curia means court and hence signifies not only the papal or Christian court par excellence, but also the episcopal court. Here it comprises all chapters, cathedral as well as collegiate, and also religious chapters,[5] i e., corporations which have corporate rights acknowledged as such. All the officials of such curiae are here intended, and all their official documents. But religious houses of female congregations are not included, because the local Ordinary and the religious superiors are responsible for them.[6]

The officials named are to be punished if they presumptuously commit an act here prohibited.

§ 2. Officials who maliciously refuse to copy, transmit, or produce such records, documents or books to those who are lawfully entitled to have a copy thereof, or to have them forwarded or shown, or who in any way betray their office, may be punished by privation or suspension from office and, in addition thereto, be fined if the Ordinary deems it proper, in proportion to the seriousness of their crime. This concerns not only the notaries or chancellors of dioceses, but also the vicars-general and the priests entrusted with the government of a diocese according to can. 381. The notaries and pastors have to give out abstracts of or extracts from ecclesiastical registers, or let those who are entitled to see them inspect the original papers.[7] Pastors are obliged to communicate

3 Can. 843, § 1; 1549.
4 Can. 470.
5 Du Cange, Glossarium, I, 1257; see can. 383.
6 Can. 535.
7 Can. 384.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

marriage records to the pastor in whose parish the parties have been baptized.[8] The officials of the court from which appeal is made are bound to forward the acts to the court of appeal.[9] Title deeds must be safely kept and not allowed to come into the possession of interested, much less of maliciously inclined, persons.[10]

The pecuniary penalty is of ancient date and was applied to the church that had suffered from the malicious conduct of these officials.[11] Privation and suspension must be strictly referred to the office itself, and are vindictive penalties.

ATTEMPTED BRIBERY OF DIOCESAN OFFICIALS

Can. 2407

Qui Curiae officiales seu administros quosvis ecclesiasticos, iudices, advocatos vel procuratores donis aut pollicitationibus ad actionem vel omissionem officio suo contrariam inducere tentaverit, congrua poena plectatur et ad reparanda damna, si qua illata sint, compellatur.

Whoever attempts, by gifts or promises, to induce ecclesiastical officials or ministers of the (diocesan or ecclesiastical, also Roman) court — judges, advocates, or procurators, — to an action or omission contrary to their office, shall be punished according to his deserts and compelled to repair any damage that may have been caused by his conduct. Here the inchoate crime of bribery is punished, and the punishment is inflicted on those who make the attempt (conatus delicti), no matter whether it is or is not successful.[1]

8 Can. 1103, § 2; 470, § 3.
9 Can. 1644, 1890; Bened. XIV, "Ad militantis," March 30, 1741.
10 See cc. 33, 40, C. 12, q. 2.
11 Ibid.
1 See 2212, § 3, § 4.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Such attempts may be made by gifts or promises. Can. 1624 forbids the acceptance of any kind of presents, even food or drink. Promises are punishable even if given conditionally. The object or aim of the attempt is to cause an official to commit or to omit an act contrary to the obligations of his office. The positive act (actio) may be committed by the judge who refuses his services to such as lawfully ask him, or who violates an entrusted secret, or declares himself competent when he is not, or deliberately renders an unjust sentence.[2]

Lawyers and procurators may betray their office by unjust acts or illegal means.[3]

By omission judges become guilty in cases which require official (ex officio) procedure if they omit to execute the sentence or fail to forward the acts to the court of appeal.[4] A doubt may arise as to couriers and beadles, because they may be laymen,[5] and the text only mentions ecclesiastics. However, since they are in the service of the ecclesiastical court, they no doubt incur the above-mentioned penalty if they violate the official secret or neglect to carry out summonses or orders to the detriment of the party concerned.

OVERCHARGE OF TAXES

Can. 2408

Taxas consuetas et legitime approbatas ad normam can. 1507, augentes aut ultra eas aliquid exigentes, gravi mulcta pecuniaria coerceantur, et recidivi ab officio suspendantur vel removeantur pro culpae gravi-

2 Can. 1608; 1625, § 1.
3 Can. 1666.
4 Can. 1618; 1938: 1920, § 2; 1644; 1890; Eichmann, l. c., p. 235.
5 Can. 1591–1593.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

tate, praeter obligationem restituendi quod iniuste perceperint.

With the exception of taxes for matrimonial dispensations and funeral services (see can. 1056 and 1234), all other taxes and stole fees must be fixed by a provincial council or meeting of the bishops and be approved by the Apostolic See (can. 1507).

Those who charge more than the customary and legally established taxes, or permit or demand something beyond the taxes fixed and determined, shall be checked by heavy fines, and in case of relapse, be suspended or removed, according to the gravity of their fault. They are, besides, obliged to make restitution of the ill-gotten goods. Free gifts or donations in excess of the taxes are not forbidden and may be lawfully kept by the recipient. The penalties of suspension and removal are ferendae sententiae, but may become obligatory in a serious case of relapse. The gravity of the fault must be gauged by the character of the offender, his stubbornness, the persons who were overcharged, and the amount of the overcharge. The fines are to be applied according to can. 2297.

ILLEGAL ISSUANCE OF DIMISSORIAL LETTERS BY THE VICAR CAPITULAR

Can. 2409

Vicarius Capitularis concedens litteras dimissorias pro ordinatione contra praescriptum can. 958, § 1, n. 3, ipso facto subiacet suspensioni a divinis.

According to can. 958, § 1, n. 3, the vicar capitular

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

(our administrator), with the consent of the chapter (our diocesan consultors), may issue dimissorial letters after the vacancy of the episcopal see has lasted one year.

Within the first year the vicar capitular may grant such letters only to arctati.[1] If he would issue dimissorials without the consent of the chapter, or within the first year of vacancy, he would ipso facto incur suspension a divinis, which, however, is not reserved.

RELIGIOUS SUPERIORS GRANTING ILLEGAL DIMISSORIALS

Can. 2410

Superiores religiosi qui, contra praescriptum can. 965-967, subditos suos ad Episcopum alienum ordinandos remittere praesumpserint, ipso facto suspensi sunt per mensem a Missae celebratione.

Can. 965 prescribes that religious superiors, who are entitled to issue dimissorials according to can. 964, should address them to the bishop in whose diocese is located the religious house of which the ordinand is a member.[1] Can. 966 enumerates the cases in which religious superiors are permitted to have their subjects ordained by another bishop, provided the diocesan chancellor testifies to the existence of one of the reasons. Can. 967 warns superiors against fraudulent dealing.[2] Can. 2410 sanctions these enactments thus: Religious superiors who dare to send their ordinands to another bishop are ipso facto suspended from saying Mass for one month.

Note the term praesumpserint. There would be no

1 See Vol. IV of this Commentary, pp. 427 f.

1 See Vol. IV of this Commentary pp. 434 ff.

2 See Vol. IV of this Commentary pp. 442 f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

presumption if a religious order had a privilege permitting it to have its members ordained by any Catholic bishop; nor would there be presumption if they would act thus under the impression that all regulars possessed such a privilege; or that this privilege was still valid, which may really be the case. Neither would there be presumption if the diocesan officials would refuse to issue an attestation that the bishop is absent or does not hold ordinations. For the law grants the religious this right, and if the diocesan officials unjustly or unreasonably refuse it, the religious are entitled to assert the law, which is more than a mere formality of attestation. This canon also applies to religious living a common life according to can. 673, if their community enjoys the privilege of granting dimissorials to its members.[3]

ILLEGAL ADMISSION TO NOVITIATE OR PROFESSION

Can. 2411

Superiores religiosi qui candidatum non idoneum contra praescriptum can. 542, aut sine requisitis litteris testimonialibus contra praescriptum can. 544, ad novitiatum receperint, vel ad professionem contra praescriptum can. 571, § 2 admiserint, pro gravitate culpae puniantur, non exclusa officii privatione.

Religious superiors who

1. Have received into the novitiate candidates

a) Who under the common law cannot be admitted either validly or licitly, as per can. 542, the whole of which is here intended; or who

[3] Commissio Pontif. 2-3 June 1918, in Acta Apostolical Sedis, Vol. X, p. 347.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

b) Have received candidates into the novitiate without testimonial letters, as prescribed by can. 544; or who

2. Have admitted novices, although fit, before their novitiate was completed, to temporary profession, as forbidden by can. 517, § 2; — shall be punished according to the gravity of the fault; if necessary, by privation from office.[1]

The first part of this canon (n. 1; a and b) also applies to religious societies, with due regard to their constitutions.[2]

Observe that presumption or ignorance is not admitted in the text, the reason being that every superior worthy of the name is supposed to know and to apply these essential laws.

TRANSGRESSIONS CONCERNING DOWRIES AND NOTIFICATION OF THE ORDINARY

Can. 2412

Religiosarum etiam exemptarum Antistitae pro gravitate culpae, non exclusa, si res ferat, officii privatione, ab Ordinario loci puniantur:

1°. Si contra praescriptum can. 548 dotes puellarum receptarum quoquo modo impendere praesumpserint, salva semper obligatione de qua in can. 551;

2°. Si contra praescriptum can. 552 omiserint Ordinarium loci certiorem facere de proxima alicuius admissione ad novitiatum vel ad professionem.

Religious superioresses, even of exempt institutes,

1 If a professed member leaves the institute, her entire dowry, except the interest, must be restored to her (Can. 551, § 1); in case of transfer can. 551, § 2 must be observed.

2 Commissio Pont., June 2–3, 1918 (A. Ap. S., X, 347).

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

shall be punished by the local Ordinary according to the gravity of their fault,— if necessary, by privation from office, —

1. If they dare to expend the dowries of their members contrary to can. 549;[1] or

2. If they neglect to notify the local Ordinary of the admission of candidates to the novitiate, or of novices to profession, as required by can. 552.

The canon here quoted requires a threefold notification: 1°. before admission to the novitiate, 2°. before admission to the temporary profession, 3°. before admission to the perpetual profession. But no information, either formal or informal, is required for the annual renewal of vows, which is customary in some religious institutes. Some sisterhoods renew the vows every year after the temporary profession, for the space of three or five years. For such renewal no notification is required.

Observe that the first section of this canon supposes presumption (praesumpserint). Therefore, if the superioress thought it proper to expend the dowries of her nuns for building a school or a chapel, or for some other purpose, because the money was ready at hand and she forgot the ruling of can. 549, the local Ordinary may be lenient, and instead of dealing out a penalty, may read to her said canon; provided the case is not too serious.

§ 2 contains no mention of presumption, because religious superiors are supposed to know this law and to respect the authority of the Church.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

RELIGIOUS SUPERIORS INTERFERING WITH THE CANONICAL VISITATION

Can. 2413

§ 1. Antistitae quae post indictam visitationem religiosas in aliam domum, Visitatore non consentiente, transtulerint, itemque religiosae omnes, sive Antistitae sive subditae, quae per se vel per alios, directe vel indirecte, religiosas induxerint ut interrogatae a Visitatore taceant vel veritatem quoquo modo dissimulent aut non sincere exponant, vel eisdem, ob responsa quae Visitatori dederint, molestiam, sub quovis praetextu, attulerint, inhabiles ad officia assequenda, quae aliarum regimen secumferunt, a Visitatore declarentur et Antistitae officio, quo funguntur, priventur.

§ 2. Quae in superiore paragrapho praescripta sunt, etiam virorum religionibus applicentur.

This canon is the penal sanction of can. 511–513, as far as the canonical visitation concerns the religious themselves, not the visiting superior, although the latter is under strict obligation to make the visitation at the time stated in law and according to the approved Constitutions of the resp. institute.[1]

Note that the Code does not adopt the severe penalties laid down in the Decretals against nuns who rashly attempt to impede episcopal visitation. They incurred ipso facto excommunication notwithstanding all their

1 See Vol. III of this Commentary, pp. 133 ff.; also Pellizzarius, Tractatus de Monialibus, Rome, 1755, p. 315; cap. X, n. 65 (this edition was corrected by F. Montani; the first edition had been placed on the Index); Lezzana, Summa Quaest. Regul., 1637, p. 239; this obligation is said to rest on natural and divine law.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google privileges.[2] Neither does our text suppose presumptuous violence, as when religious shut their doors by force against the canonical visitor. If this should happen, the visitor would be justified in meeting force with force, and also to pronounce excommunication against such unruly religious.[3]

The persons affected by this canon may be divided into two principal classes.

1. Religious superioresses who, after a visitation has been duly announced, transfer religious to another house against the will of the visitor.

Antistitae are the superior general as well as the provincial, provided the latter is in any way entitled to transfer religious to another house or usurps this right against the rule of the institute. The purpose of such conduct palpably is to remove such as may testify against the superioress.

Post indictam visitationem supposes that the visitation was announced, but a formal announcement is not required if the visitation is held regularly every five years. Yet the law supposes an express announcement. This all the more since, as a rule, the canonical visitation should be made known to the religious, so that they may prepare themselves for it.[4]

The transfer may be only temporary and most probably it will be made under one pretext or another. But it does not matter whether it was made permanently or temporarily, if it was done against the express will of the visitor (visitatore non consentiente). We say express, because the text supposes that the visitor forbade or did not consent to the transfer. Neither does it matter

2 C. 2, Clem. III, 10.
3 Pellizzarius, l. c., p. 299; cap. X, n. 24.
4 Lezzana, l. c., p. 373; cap. 27, n. 2.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google whether the transfer was made to a religious house of the same or of another province, or to a local house or colony or summer resort.

2. The second clause considers two different momenta: one before or on the day of the canonical visitation, the other afterwards.

a) All religious, whether superiors or subjects, who induce other religious to keep silence or misrepresent the truth in any way or explain things insincerely when asked by the visitator, no matter whether the religious induce other religious to do these things themselves or through intermediary persons, are to be declared incapable of holding any office involving the government of others and deposed from the office of superiors.

The inducement may be made directly, especially by superiors, by way of command, threat, etc., or indirectly by promises or flattery or special attention, without expressing special reference to the visitation.

The intermediary persons may be outsiders, servants, students, parents, relatives, friends. It is required, however, that these inducements produce an effect upon the religious. For not the mere attempt is intended, as in can. 2407.

The phrase ut interrogatae, supposes that the religious was asked by the visitor. There is no strict and general obligation compelling religious to present themselves of their own accord before the visitor. This obligation only arises if the visitor imposes it on all religious without exception, or if the rule or Constitutions demand it. However, if the visitor calls one, she (or he) is obliged to obey. Nor are they allowed to keep silence (tacere) if he asks them questions, for that would be tantamount to contempt for authority. Occult crimes, of which there is no rumor, must not be revealed, nor faults or transgressions which have already been corrected.[5]

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

On the other hand the religious are not allowed to dissimulate or to make untruthful statements concerning either disciplinary or financial matters.

b) Religious, either superiors or inferiors, who, under any pretext, vex other religious on account of answers given to the visitor are to be punished in the same way.

The pretext may be a species of zeal or promotion, but in fact is removal. Reproaches, private or public remarks, signs of displeasure, may also be used to vex others. Quite different, of course, would be a paternal or maternal admonition based on the results of the canonical visitation.[6]

3. The penalty for these transgressions enumerated under 1 and 2 is as follows: They shall be declared incapable of holding any office which implies government of others, and, if they are superiors, they shall be deprived of their office.[7]

Offices implying "government of others" are those held by superiors ——— general, provincial, or local; also by mistresses of novices, assistants, prefects or directrices of schools or academies, also pastors and chaplains. Those who themselves spurn authority are not fit to rule others.

§ 2 of can. 2413 says that what has been prescribed in the preceding paragraph also applies to male institutes.

5 Ibid. see this Commentary, Vol. III, pp. 138 f.

6 Here a remark may be permissible: The visitor is not allowed to reveal the names of those who "had something to say" to the religious superior; much less is he allowed to give their names to the confessor or chaplain. This would be an abuse of trust, apt to cause jealousy, rancor, aversion, nay even enmity.

7 There is no special penalty provided for a visitor who abuses his power or office; but can. 2404 is applicable to him.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

And since the text does not distinguish between exempt and non-exempt, all are included. But the visitor must perform this duty himself, and only in case of a lawful impediment may he substitute another, who, however, must belong to the same order or congregation, because he should know the rules and constitutions.[8] The visitor intended in § 1, on the other hand, is the local Ordinary or prelate regular with regard to nuns with solemn vows; whether the female visitor is included, seems doubtful.[9] This canon is also applicable to religious societies who lead a common life.[10]

SUPERIORESS VIOLATING FREEDOM OF CONSCIENCE

Can. 2414

Antistita quae contra praescriptum can. 521, § 3, 522, 523 se gesserit a loci Ordinario moneatur; si iterum deliquerit, ab eodem officii privatione puniatur, illico tamen certiore facta Sacra Congregatione de Religiosis.

Superiors of female religious institutes who violate the rules laid down in can. 521, § 3, can. 522, and can. 523, shall be warned by the local Ordinary (see can. 2307). If they commit the same offence again, they shall be deprived of their office and the S. Congregation of Religious shall be immediately notified of the fact. It is unnecessary to add anything to what we have said under the canons quoted,[11] except that it is the local

8 Lezzana, l. c., p. 251; cap. 18, n. 92.

9 At least we hardly believe that she could inflict the penalties mentioned.

10 A. Ap. S., X, 347.

11 See Vol. III of this Commentary, pp. 159–164; Vol. IV, pp. 269f.

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Ordinary, not the religious superior, much less the pastor or chaplain, who may proceed thus.

LAUS DEO ET REGINAE PACIS

END

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

GENERAL INDEX

This general index is made on the English text, though not exclusively, quite a number of Latin terms being inserted for the convenience of those accustomed to the ecclesiastical terminology. The Roman number refers to the Volumes, the arabic to the pages.

The canons contained in the eight volumes are distributed as follows:

Volume I:	Canons	1–86:	General Rules; Public Law of the Church.
Volume II:	"	87–486:	The Clergy and Hierarchy.
Volume III:	"	487–725:	Religious.
Volume IV:	"	726–1011; 1144–1153:	Sacraments and Sacramentals.
Volume V:	"	1012–1143; 1960–1992:	Marriage Law.
Volume VI:	"	1154–1551:	Administrative Law.
Volume VII:	"	1552–2194:	Ecclesiastical Trials.
Volume VIII:	"	2195–2414:	The Penal Code.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

INDEX

A

Abatement of proceeding, VII, 182.

Abbas Nullius, II, 200 ff.; burial of, VI, 106; consecration of altars, VII, 193; consecration of churches, VI, 4; as to marriage, V, 274, 276; neglect of blessing, VIII, 503; ordination, IV, 424; privilegium fori, VIII, 367; rights, II, 331 ff.; s. supellex, VI, 271; trials, appeals, VII, 46 f.

Abbatia nullius, erection, II, 200 f.

Abbot Primate, II, 526; III, 49, 59, 111.

Abbots, postulation, II, 151; pontificals, III, 29, 351 f.; presidents, II, 526; III, 113 f.; primate, II, 526; titular, III, 147; hearing confession, IV, 259; as to minor orders, IV, 413; consecration of churches, VI, 5; as to forbidding books, VI, 456; suspended, VIII, 224; priv. fori, VIII, 367.

Abduction, impediment, V, 192 f.; of women, VIII, 407 f.; of impuberes, VIII, 409.

Ab homine penalty, VIII, 75, 121; multiplied censures, VIII, 127; reserved censures, VIII, 131, 137; in danger of death, VIII, 153: in normal conditions, VIII, 155; presumption, VIII, 166; suspension, VIII, 227; disability, VIII, 250.

Abjuration of secret societies, VIII, 345.

Abortion, irregularity, IV, 489; penalty, VIII, 397 ff.

Absence from diocese, II, 98 f.

Absent members of chapters, II, 125.

Absolution from censures, VIII, 139 ff.; from several censures, VIII, 143 f.; complicis, IV, 291 f.; VIII, 162, 434 f.; from sin and censure, VIII, 145 f.; formula of, VIII, 147 f.; in danger of death, IV, 286; VIII, 151 ff.; in normal conditions, VIII, 154 ff.; in more urgent cases, VIII, 158 ff.; from apostasy, heresy, VIII, 281 f.; without faculties, VIII, 432; from irregularities, IV, 506; from reserved sins, IV, 330 ff.

Abstinence, days of, VI, 179; dispensation, VI, 163; law of, VI, 177.

Abuse of authority and office, VIII, 46; of eccl. power, VIII, 505 ff.

Abusus baptismi, IV, 486; ordinis, IV, 493 f.

Academic degrees, VIII, 249 f.

Accessories to crime, VIII, 52.

Accessus, at trials, VII, 250.

Accidents in crime, VIII, 36.

Accomplices in crime, VIII, 49.

Accounts, by religious, III, 179 f., 190 f.; hindering rel. state,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

III, 213; books, VII, 267.
Accusation of marriage, V, 416 f.; post mortem, V, 420.
Acquisition of goods by religious, III, 278 f.; of eccl. property, VI, 557 ff.
Actio adipiscendae, VII, 143; recuperandae, VII, 145; retinendae. VII, 145; ad exhibendum, VII, 264 f.; petitoria-possessoria. VII, 119, 141 f.; nullitatis actorum, VII, 129; rescissoria. VII, 133 f.; extructiva. VII. 147; criminalis, VII, 359 f.
Actions, personal and real, VI, 600; VII, 148; petitory, possessory, VII, 119 f.; VII, 141 f.; nullitatis actorum, VII, 129; rescissory, VII, 133 f.; extinguishment of, VII, 147; criminal, civil, VII, 359 f.; VIII, 531.
Actor sequitur reum, V, 408; VII, 17.
Acts, legal forbidden, VIII, 167 f., 187 ff., 247; to infamous, VIII, 247, 249; suspected, VIII, 286; for suicide, VIII, 403; for immorality, VIII, 415 f.; for mixed marriages, VIII, 452 f.; for religious apostasy, VIII, 470; official neglected, VIII, 508 f.; null and void, II, 29 ff.; legal to be entered, II, 409 f.; causae processus, VII, 90; judicial, how kept, VII, 88.
Adjudged matter, VII, 183; nature, etc., VII, 334 f.
A divinis, suspension from, VIII, 221.
Administration of Sacraments, IV, 18; rites in, IV, 26; neglect of, VII, 465 f.; of orders, IV, 499; of churches, VI, 52 ff.; of property, VI, 577 ff.; bad, of temporalities, VII, 418; of Sacraments by excommunicated, VIII, 179 f., 182 f.; by suspended, VIII, 231 f.
Administrators, Apostolic, II, 326 ff.; of parishes, II, 565 f.; of institutions, VI, 581; of property, VI, 579; their duties, VI, 582, 586; of pious foundations as to Masses, IV, 207 f.; Vicar-Capitular, q. v.; excommunicated, VIII, 188; suspended, VIII, 220.
Admission to novitiate, III, 205 ff.; illegal, VIII, 514 f.; to profession, III, 255; VIII, 514; to postulation, II, 106; to religious institutes, III, 198 ff.; right of admitting, III, 214 f.; to seminaries, VI, 395.
Admonitions, religious dismissal. III, 402 ff.; in criminal cases, VII, 378; oral-written, VII, 405; in transfer, VII, 448; non-resident clergy, VII, 452; against concubinarians, VII, 459; pastoral neglect, VII, 465; paternal. VII, 481 f. (See Warning)
Adnotations, VI, 434, 471.
Adoption, legal, impediment, V, 140, 217 f.
Adoration, of Bl. Sacrament, VI, 218; perpetual, VI, 219.
Adultery, in crime, V, 195 f.; VIII, 414 f.; as to Pauline Privilege, V, 350; as to separation, V, 371; action quashed, VII, 150.
Adults, baptism of, IV, 44, 57 f.
Advice, when required, II, 35 f.; of examiners, VII, 420, 427.
Ad vitanda scandala, VIII, 5, 169, 173, 182.
Advocates, VII, 107 f.
Advowson, II, 106; VI, 524 ff. (See Can. 2263, 2347, 2345, 2391, 2392, 2393).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Affidavits, VII, 258; of protest, VIII, 349.
Affiliation of Tertiaries, III, 68 f.
Affinity, degrees, II, 19; as to offices, II, 115; as to marriage, V, 208 ff.
Age, canonical, II, 81; impediment, V, 163 f.; major, minor, II, 10 f.; of bishops, II, 343; as to crime, VIII, 37; novitiate, III, 207; enclosure, VIII, 370; profession, III, 255; profession of faith, IV, 21; old age, IV, 402; orders, IV, 457; VIII, 451; of religious superiors, III, 118.
Aggregation of confraternities, III, 458.
Aggressus, in benefices, VI, 543; resignation, VII, 424.
A iure, penalty, VIII, 75, 121; reserved censures, VIII, 131, 137; in danger of death, VIII, 153; in normal condition, VIII, 155; suspension, VIII, 227.
Alexian Brothers, III, 13.
Alienation, of property, III, 183 ff.; of relics and images, VI, 244; of church property, VI, 592 ff.; formalities, VI, 599; penalty for, VIII, 392 ff.
All Souls Day, IV, 368.
Alms for Masses (see Stipends). IV, 175 ff.
Altars, Consecrated, VI, 22, 91 f.; definition, VI, 84; requisites, VI. 86; species, VI, 84; titles, VI, 96; use profane, VI, 97.
Altar stone, IV, 169; breads, VI, 226; Blessed Sacrament's, VI, 218; papal, IV, 174 f.; portable, IV, 169 f.; privileged, IV, 194 f.; 365 f.
"Altitudo" of Paul III, V, 361.
Ambassadors, II, 285.
Amendment, lack of, III, 404 f., libelli, VII, 161, 179.
Amentes, baptism of, IV, 62 f.
Amusements of clergy, II, 86 f.
Analogy, imperial laws, VIII, 80.
Anathema, VIII, 114, 169 f.
Ancestral tombs, VI, 132; worship, VI, 202.
Animus et voluntas, V, 228.
Anointments, in baptism, IV, 70.; in confirmation, IV, 99; in Extr. Unction, IV, 407.
Antimensia, IV, 159, 174.
Antony, St. III, 1.
Apocrisiarii, II, 279.
Apostates, from faith, VIII, 276 f.; as to orders, IV, 486; orders received from, VIII, 448; as to burial, VI, 153; VIII, 360; definition of, VI, 335; religious, III, 381 f.; VIII, 467 f.; books of, VI, 468, 483; VIII, 295.
Apostolic indult, for alienation, III, 185; VI, 597; VIII, 394.
Apostolic See, appeals to, VII, 24; meaning of, I, 78; ordinary tribunals, VII, 49 f.; persona moralis. II. 3; temporal right, VI, 549, 555; prescription of, VI, 569; as to interdict by, VIII, 198; penalties, VIII, 174; condemned doctrine, VIII, 291; international position, I, 226 ff.
"Apostolicae Sedis," VIII, 274, 277, 287, 289, 291, 314, 317, 328, 337, 341, 351, 354, 363 f., 369, 376, 385, 398, 404, 420.
Apparitores (Beadles) VII, 44.
Appeals, in matrimonial cases, V, 432 ff.; to Apostolic See, VII, 24; court of, VII, 92; definition, when, VII, 318 ff.; effect of, VII, 324; lapse of term, VII, 324; in devolutivo, suspensivo, II, 190; from abuse, VIII, 62, 111, 334 f.; to general Council, VIII, 327 f.; from vindictive

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google penalties, VIII, 237; from censures, VIII, 121 f.

Application of Mass, IV, 143 f.; required (stipend), IV, 181 f.; of penalties, VIII, 89 f.
Appointment of offices, II, 104 ff.
Approbation, of religious institutes, III, 49 f.; of books, VI, 449.
Arbitration, VII, 354.
Archconfraternities, III, 458 ff.
Archives, diocesan, II, 406, 411 f.; secret, II, 413 f.; parish, II, 556 f.
Arms, carrying of, II, 87.
Arson, VIII, 409.
Articuli, acts. VII, 91.
Assistance, at marriage, licit, V, 286 f.; passive, V, 309; valid, V, 271 ff.; passive, or material in heretical worship, VI, 195 f.; at service forbidden, VIII, 177 f.
Assistants, II, 559 ff.; of novice-master, III, 239 f.; as to marriage, V, 285; not allowed at Mass, IV, 149 f.; for authentic certificates, VII, 257.
Associations, of laymen, III, 425 ff.; condemned, III, 427 ff.; kinds of, III, 441; as to penalties, VIII, 474.
Assumptionists, III, 18.
Asyli Ius, VI, 47; VIII, 314.
Attempts, pending trial, VII, 297 f.; at crime, VIII, 57.
Attentata, VII, 297 f.
Attorney, forbidden, II, 91; at trials, VII, 40 f.; VII, 107 f.; removal of, VII, 115 f.; gratuitous defence, VII, 345.
Auctoritas rerum similiter iudicatarum, I, 99.
Auditores, II, 267; in trials, VII, 38 f.
Augustine, St., Augustinians, III, 9.
Ausus fuerit, VIII, 99, 349, 363, 392, 430.
Authentic documents, VII, 263; part of Corpus I. C., I, 44 f.
Author, VI, 432.
Authority of S. R. Congreg., II, 274; to establish confraternities, III, 430 f.; of school, I, 101.
Auxiliaries (bishops), II, 379 f.

B

Bail, giving of, II, 85 f.; at court, VII, 74.
Balloting, II, 134 ff.
Banns, publication of, V, 56 ff.; dispensation, V, 64 ff.; by pastor, V, 57 f.; time and place, V, 60 f.
Baptism, member by, II, 9; IV, 33 ff.; ceremonies of, IV, 65 ff.; certificate for rel. state, III, 216; doubtful in marriage, V, 145; God-parents, IV, 75 ff.; by non-Catholic ministers, VIII, 299; minister of, IV, 37 ff.; marriage as to, V, 182 ff.; place of, IV, 87 ff.; as to penalties, VIII, 114; record of, IV, 94; rites of, IV, 65 ff.; subjects of, IV, 46 ff.; time, IV, 85 f.
Basement of church, VI, 18.
Basil, St. III, 3.
Basilica, VI, 16 f., 49 f.
Beatification process, VII, 385 ff.
Bedrooms, for saying Mass, IV, 172.
Begging, see Quest.
Bells of church, VI, 28 f.
Benedict, St., Benedictines, III, 7 f.; black, III, 111.
Benedict, the Levite, I, 23.
Benedictine Congregations, II, 124.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Benedictine Sisters, III, 69.
Benefices, II, 101 f.; definition, VI, 493; division, etc., VI, 501; establishment, VI, 498; exchange, VI, 544; grant of, VI, 516 ff.; ordination title, IV, 466; resignation, VI, 542; union, transfer, VI, 501 ff.; vacant by rel. profession, III, 286; suspension from, VIII, 218, 224 f.
Beneficiaries, burial of, VI, 121; duties and rights, II, 427; VI, 536 ff.
Beneficium competentiae, II. 67 f.
Beneplacitum Apostolicum for alienation, III, 185 f.; VI, 597.
Bequests, III, 182 f.; neglect of, VIII, 395.
Betrothal, V. 34 ff.
Bible, VI. 434 f., 447. 467, 471.
Bigamists, irregular, IV, 483; punished, VIII, 411 f.
Binating, IV, 134 f.; penalty, VIII, 304 f.
Bishops, auxiliaries, II, 379 f.; buried in church, VI, 105; coadjutors, II, 378 ff.; chapels of, VI, 68; consecration, II, 347 f.; duties of, II, 348 ff.; election, II, 119 ff.; entering religious state, III, 211; judges in matters of faith, VI, 336 f.; missa pro populo. II, 366 ff.; pontificals, II, 356 f.; power, rights, II, 45 f.; 341 ff.; 348 ff.; precedence, II, 38, 375; privileges, II, 375 ff.; qualities, II. 343 ff.; relation to Holy See, II, 364 f.; religious, III, 357; residence, II, 358 f.; s. supellex, VI, 271 f.; as to penalties, VIII, 94; as to interdict, VIII, 199; priv. fori, VIII, 367; priv. canonis, VIII, 379; non-resident, VIII, 463; visitation of diocese, II, 367 f.; visit. ad limina, II, 365 f.; as witnesses, VII, 222.
Blasphemy, VIII, 308.
Blessed (Saints), VI, 236 f.
Blessing of churches, VI, 3, 6, 21; of s. supellex, VI, 281 f.; loss of, VI, 284 f.; various, IV, 563; of marriage, V, 306 f.
Blindness, II, 570; of pastors, VII, 415.
Board of diocesan administrators, VI, 579; of judges, VII, 33 f.; of seminary, VI, 390; of trustees, VI, 55.
Bona temporalia, VI, 549 ff.; ecclesiastica, VI, 555; pretiosa, VI, 555; sacra, VI, 555; of religious, III, 172 f.
Books, censorship of, VI, 433 ff.; forbidden, VI, 458 ff.; denouncing of, VI, 459; list of, VI, 466 ff.; meaning of, VI, 431; of parish, II, 556 f.; prohibition of, VI, 454 ff.; penalty for, VIII, 295 f.; neglect of parochial books, VIII, 464 f.; 508 f.
Booksellers, VI, 481 f.
Bread for Holy Eucharist, IV, 152 ff.; VI, 226; leavened, unleavened, IV, 223 f.
Brevia, Briefs, I, 15.
Breviary, of clergymen, II, 82 f.; of religious, III, 269 f.; of Sisters, III, 327 f.
Breviatio Canonum, I, 22.
Bribery of Officials, VIII, 510.
Bride's pastor preferred, V. 291.
Building of churches, VI, 13.
Bullae, I, 14 f.
Bullaria, various editions, I, 48.
Burial, Ecclesiastical, VI, 100 ff.; interment, VI, 115 ff.; granted to whom, VI, 151 ff.; of infidels, VI, 38; pastors' rights, VI, 116; services, VI, 115 ff.; selection of, VI, 126;

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of religious, III, 146; of excommunicated, VIII, 181; of interdicted, VIII, 213; ingressu ab ecclesia, VIII, 215; privation of, VIII, 249; extortion of, VIII, 357 f.; of suicide, VIII, 403; of duellers, VIII, 406.

C

Calendar of religious, III, 327.
Calumny, VIII, 382.
Camaldolese, III, 8.
Camera Ap. Rev. II, 271.
Camera spoliorum, VI, 276; VII, 133.
Camillus, St., III, 17.
Canones Apostolorum, I, 22.
Canones, Ecclesiastici Apostolorum, I, 20; Hippolyti, ibidem; Domni Abbonis, I, 28.
Canonicates, appointment to, II, 440 f.; erection, change, II, 428 f.
Canonicus, poenitentiarius, II, 426, 436 f.; theologus, ib.; penalty, VIII, 466 f.
Canons, chapters of, II, 424 ff.; honorary, II, 441 f.; duties of, II, 449 f.; precedence, II, 443 f.; privileges, II, 455 f.; residence, II, 458 f.; rights, II, 455 f.
Canonization, process, VII, 385 ff., 402.
Capacity of ownership, III, 283.
Capital Punishment, VIII, 63 f.
Capitula Martini, I, 23; Angilramni, ib.
Capitulatio, II, 134.
Capitulum, II, 424 f.
Capuchins, III, 11.
Carmelites, III, 14.
Carthusians, III, 9.
Cardinals, college of, II, 237 f.; creation, II, 231 f.; duties, II, 238 f.; insignia, II, 242; office, II, 229 f.; option, II, 235 f.; origin, II, 227 ff.; precedence, II, 38; protector, III, 98; privileges, II, 239 ff.; rank, II, 229 f.; religious, III, 357 f.; residence, II, 238 ff.; rights in their titles, II, 243 f.; rights of electing Pope, II, 244 f.; as to hearing confessions, IV, 255 f.; as to Orders, IV, 413; consecration of churches, etc., VI, 4; burial of, VI, 120; chapels of, VI, 68; s. supellex, VI, 270 f.; forbidden books, VI, 477; as witnesses, VII, 222; as to penalties, VIII, 94; as to absolution from censures, VIII, 156; priv. fori, VIII, 365; priv. canonis, VIII, 379; refusal of oath, VIII, 498.
Carelessness, VIII, 34, 100.
Cases excepted from regular trial, V, 435 f.; in beatification, VII, 400 f.
Casus perplexus, V, 105 f.
Catacombs, relics, VIII, 320.
Catechetical instructions, VI, 343 f.; neglect of, VII, 465.
Catechumens, as to interpellation, V, 352.
Cathedral churches, consecrated, VI, 22; administration, VI. 53; keeping of Bl. Sacr. VI, 214, 219; as to s. supellex, VI, 280; as to interdict, VIII, 205 f.
Cathedraticum, VI, 561 ff.
Cathedral Chapter, II, 425 ff.
Causa, privata, VI, 229; publica, VI, 231.
Causam dare interdicto, VIII, 214, 356; dare contractui, V, 235 f.; 243 f.
Causae maiores, VII, 26; implicatae, VII, 174; dubiae, ib.; matrimoniales, V. 400 ff.; ordinationis, IV, 550 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Celebret, IV, 128 f.
Celestinians, III, 14.
Celibacy of clergy, II, 77 ff.; vow of, II, 137.
Cemeteries, blessing of, VI, 6, 104 ff.; chapels, private, VI, 69; desecration, VI, 108; exhumation, VI, 113; keeping of, VI, 111; owners of, VI, 108; reconciliation, VI, 108; rights of the Church to, VI, 106; violation, VI, 108; interdict, VIII, 209; waiting time, VI, 113.
Censors of books, VI, 450 f.
Censorship of books, VI, 433 ff.
Censures, VIII, 70 f.; 104; perseverance in, VIII, 361; absolution, VIII, 107, 139 ff.; term, definition, VIII, 113 f.; use, careful of, VIII, 119; multiplication of, VIII, 124 f.; reservation of, VIII, 129 ff.; reserved to the Ordinary, VIII, 130; reserved to the Holy See, VIII, 131; interpretation of, VIII, 132 f.; preventing reception of Sacraments, VIII, 133; revival, VIII, 142; kinds of, VIII, 163 ff.
Censure violation, irregularity, IV, 494; assistance at marriage, V, 277; as to burial, VI, 154; as to marriage, V, 157 f.
Ceremonies, of baptism, IV, 65 ff.; of Mass, IV, 152 ff.; neglect of, VIII, 456 f.
Certificates, of banns, V, 67 f.; of baptism, etc., III, 216 f.; for marriage, V, 55 f.; 69.
Cessation of divine service, VI, 41; of obligation from vows, VI, 297: of obligation from oaths, VI, 314.
Cessio iuris, VI, 593.
Ceteris paribus, II, 435; VIII, 50.
Chancellor, apostolic, II, 269; diocesan, II, 406 f.
Chancery, Apostolic, II, 269; diocesan, II, 406 f.
Change of rel. institutes, III, 79 f.
Chapel, interdict, VIII, 209.
Chaplains, of Sisters, III, 170 f.; of confraternities, III, 438 f.
Chapter, diverse, III, 108; division of provinces, III, 80; general, III, 108; local, III, 108; power of, III, 108; provincial, III, 108.
Chapters, voting, II, 23 ff.; of prelates nullius, II, 337 f.; of canons, II, 424 ff.; cathedral, II, 427 f.; collegiate, ib.; meetings, II, 446 f.; statutes, II, 446 f.; as to preaching, VI, 361.
Character, indelible of three Sacraments, IV, 23; of writing, VII, 93.
Charges for novitiate, III, 249.
Chastity, III, 45; effects of vow, III, 272 f.; marriage impediment, V, 136 f. 189.
Children, as to domicile, II, 13 ff.; education, V, 378; as to marriage, V, 79; parents' duties to, V, 330; as to religious state, III, 206 f.; communion of, IV, 226 f.
Chorepiscopi, II, 378, 497, 505.
Choir service of religious, III, 324 f.
Chrism, IV, 97 f.
Christian Brothers, III, 17.
Church, right to teach, VI, 319 f.; right to train clergy, VI, 374; right to establish schools, VI, 416; right to censorship of books, VI, 428 f.; right to possess, VI, 549 f.; a society (ius pub.) I, 187 ff.; II, 3 ff.; right to judiciary power, VII, 3 ff.; right to coercive power,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

VIII, 59 f.; to excommunication, VIII, 168, 171; temporal power, VIII, 384; vindictive penalties, VIII, 236; violated in freedom, VIII, 334 f.; violated in property, VIII, 387.
Church and State, as to crimes, VIII, 19 f.; as to coercive power, VIII, 59 ff.; as to interdict, VIII, 195; plotting against, VIII, 341 f.; history of, I, 200 ff.; history in U. S., I. 247 ff.
Church, building, administration of, VI, 51: baptized in Cath. Church, V, 297; "Outside the Church," V, 323; building of, VI, 13; dedication of, VI, 19; desecration of, VI, 35; patron, VI, 26; reconciliation of, VI, 42; repair of, VI, 58; for publication of banns, V, 61; titles and feasts, VI, 25.
Circumstances, aggravating, VIII, 45 f.; relieving of guilt, VIII, 77.
Cistercians, III, 8.
Civil cases, method, VII, 3, 68; crimes, VIII, 20; defensor, VII, 108; quashed, VII, 148 f.; ceremony, V, 230; marriage, V, 4 ff.
Civilis officii causa, VI, 196.
Claim to absolution from censure, VIII, 141.
Clandestinity, V, 267 ff., 388.
Clausulae, I, 128 f., 149 f.
Clementinae, I, 40 ff.
Clergy, name, II, 41; celibacy, II, 77 f.; distinction, II, 43 ff.; examination, II, 74 f.; insolvent, II, 67 f.; dress, II, 84 f.; obligations, II, 70 ff.; privileges, II, 56 ff.; scientific equipment, II, 74 f.; occupations, II, 85 ff.; admission to religious state, III, 211 f.
Clerics, Freemasons, VIII, 346; vitandi, VIII, 353 f.; priv. fori, VIII, 367 f.; priv. canonis, VIII, 376 ff.; embezzlers, VIII, 392; clerical offenders contra sextum, VIII, 416 ff.
Clerical institutes, III, 46 f.; administration of sacraments, III, 142 f.; training, IV, 452 f.; VI, 374.
Closing of evidence, VII, 302.
Coadjutors of Bishops, II, 378 ff.; of pastors, II, 568 f.
Coemptio, V, 266.
Cogentes (burial), VIII, 358 f.; to clerical-religious state, VIII, 407.
Collatio libera, II, 105.
Collectanea S. C. Prop. Fid., I, 49.
Collectio Anselmo Dicata, I, 28; Anselmi Lucani, ib.; Canonum Card. Deusdedit, ib.; Decretales Bonizonis, ib.; Polycarpi, ib.; Trium Partium, I, 29.
Collections of Canon Law, I, 20 ff.; of the Occident, I, 21 ff.; of the Orient, I, 20 f.; Quesnelliana, I, 22; Dacheriana, I, 22; Gregorianae, I, 28; Authentic (See Decretals); various for publication, VI, 446.
Collegiate chapter, II, 428; churches, VI, 52 f.
Commentaries, VI, 435, 471.
Communicatio in sacris, VI, 192 f.; VIII, 285, 289; with vitandus, VIII, 352.
Communion, Holy, IV, 213 ff.; of children, IV, 225; fast before, IV, 234; frequent, IV, 241; at Mass, IV, 215; minister, IV, 213 ff.; obligation, IV, 236; place for receiving, IV, 247; public, IV, 218; recipients, IV, 224 ff.; rite, IV, 244; one species, IV, 223; for gaining indulg., IV, 388; time for receiving, IV, 245;

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google unworthy, IV, 240; Viaticum, IV, 221.

Community, as to interdict, VIII, 171, 211; suspended, VIII, 233; life violated, VIII, 480; without vows, III, 416 f.; and custom, I, 109.
Commutation of pious works, IV, 394; of vows, VI, 307.
Compensation not allowed to religious, III, 380; of witnesses, VII, 234.
Competency of court, VII, 11 ff.; connectio causarum, VII, 22; by contract, VII, 21; crime, VII, 21; domicile, VII, 18; prevention, VII, 23; rei sitae, VII, 20; reserved, VII, 12.
Compilatio Iuris Canonici, I, 28.
Compilationes Quinque, I, 36.
Complaint, bill of, VII, 158 ff.
Compos sui, II, 10 f.
Compromise in election, II, 139 f.; in lawsuits, VII, 352 f.
Compulsion, in marriage, V, 247; assistance at, V, 281; ordination, II, 194, 198; to clerical-religious state, VIII, 406 f.
Conatus delicti, VIII, 55 f., 510.
Concelebratio, IV, 127 f.
Conciliary theory, II, 225 f.
Conciones, VIII, 383.
Conclave, VIII, 322 f.
Conclusio in causa, VII, 301 f.
Concordats, I, 74 f.; 210 ff.; II, 61.
Concordia Canonum, I, 22.
Concubinage, of clergy, VII, 458 f.; public propriety, V, 213; penalty, VIII, 415.
Concursus, II, 528 f.
Condemned doctrines, VIII, 289 f.
Condemnatory sentence, VIII, 91, 103, 180, 182 f., 189 f., 192, 232, 356; suspension of, VIII, 238, 448.
Conditional baptism, IV, 72 f.; marriage, V, 253 ff.
Condonation, of adultery, V, 372.
Confarreatio, V, 265.
Conferences, pastoral, of clergymen, II, 74 ff.; of religious, III, 297; penalties, VIII, 455 f.
"Confessio" (altar), VI, 85.
Confession, annual, IV, 348; different rite, IV, 347; for indulgence, IV, 388; through interpreter, IV, 340; place for, IV, 350 f.; sacrilegious, IV, 349; juridical, VII, 196 ff.
Confessions, hearing by non-priests, VIII, 305 f.; without faculties, VIII, 431 f.; seal of, violated, VIII, 441; freedom as to, VIII, 521.
Confessors, of religious, III, 153 ff.; of Sisters, III, 157 ff.; ordinary, III, 158 f.; extraordinary, ib.; qualities, III, 164 f.; appointment, III, 166 f.; duration of office, III, 167 f.; removal, III, 168 f.; of lay institutes, III, 170; of seminaries, VI, 393; no witnesses, VII, 203; Saints, VII, 386; jurisdiction, IV, 255 ff.; of exempt religious, IV, 260; of female religious, IV, 265; examination of, IV, 273; irregularities, IV, 506; judge and physician, IV, 298; novice-master, IV, 306; as to marriage, V, 103; as to reserved cases, VIII, 160 f.; as to vindictive penalties, VIII, 241.
Conficere Sacramentum, IV, 26.
Confirmation, form, IV, 97 ff.; minister, IV, 100 f.; administered by priests, VIII, 430 f.; record and proof of, IV, 123; sponsors, IV, 118 ff.; subjects, IV, 112; time and

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google place, IV, 116 f.; in office, II, 106.

Confraternities, III, 425 ff.; in especial, III, 448 ff.; burial, VI, 129; of Christian Doctrine, VI, 346.
Congregations S. Rom., Collections, I, 49; Decreta Authentica, I, 49.
Congregations S. R., II, 250; Caeremonialis, II, 262; Consistorial, II, 252; Council, II, 256; Extraordinary Affairs, II, 263; H. Office, II, 250; Oriental Church, II, 264; Propaganda, II, 259; Religious, II, 257; Rites, II, 261; Sacraments, II, 254; Studies, II, 263; their decisions, II, 274 ff.; monastic, III, 111 f.; of religious, III, 48, 343 f.
Consanguinei as to office, II, 115; as to marriage, accusation, V, 419; of pastors, VII, 417.
Consanguinity, degrees, II, 19 f.; as to offices, II, 115; marriage impediment, V, 200 ff.; multiplication of, V, 206 f.
Conscience, liberty of, III, 519; manifestation, III, 171; tranquillity of, III, 162 f.
Conscientiae, tranquillitatem ad, III, 162; quietem, IV, 269 f.; in marriage, V, 97.
Consecration, of altars, VI, 91 ff.; diverse, IV, 561 f.; of bells, VI, 30; of sacred places, VI, 2 ff.; anniversary, VI, 24; definition, VI, 2; formula, VI, 20; minister, VI, 3 f.; proof, VI, 7; registration, ib.; loss of, VI, 32, 93; indulgence, VI, 24; effect of, VI, 33; of s. supellex, VI, 282 f.; loss of, VI, 284 f.; of bishops, II, 347; without mandate, VIII, 444; neglect of, VIII, 499.
Consecrated species, VIII, 302 f.
Consecrators of bishops, IV, 417.
Consent, when required, II, 35 f.; want of, in profession, III, 290; in engagements, V, 38; marriage, V, 13, 222 ff.; continuance of, V, 262 f.; of parents, V, 79; renewal of marital, V, 380 f.; want of consent, V, 386, 409.
Consilium, II, 35 f.
Conspiracy, VIII, 48 f.; against authority, VIII, 323 f.
Constituta, I, 13.
Constitutiones, RR. PP., I, 15; Apostolorum, I, 20; three papal on Pauline Privilege, V, 360 f.
Constitutions of religious, III, 50, 54, 60 f.
Constitutive Sacramentals, IV, 565.
Consuetudinarii, as to orders, IV, 450 f.
Consultors, advice, consent, II, 35; pastors, II, 419 f.; diocesan, II, 463 ff.; appointment, II, 465 ff.; obligations, II, 466 f.; qualities. II, 466 f.
Consummated crime, VIII, 116.
Contempt in, declared, VII, 176, 289; definition, etc., VII, 288 f.; of authority, VIII, 41 f.; of faith, ib.
Contentions, procedure, VII, 3 f.
Continuance of consent, V, 262 f.
Continuatio ad Capitularia Regum Francorum, I, 23.
Contracts, VI, 590 ff., 610 f.; engagement, V, 37.
Contumacy for censure, VIII, 117 f., 362; in court, VII, 288 ff.
Contumelia Creatoris, V, 350, 360.
Convalidation of profession, III, 288, f.
Conventuals, III, 11.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Converts, II, 13; as to baptism, IV, 41.
Cooperatores of pastors, II, 568 f.
Copia confessarii, IV, 233.
Copula, matrimonial, in impotency, V, 166 f.; ignorance of, V, 230; purpose of, V, 328; right to, V, 241 f.; theory, V, 2; renewal of consent, V, 383.
Cornerstone, blessing, of, VI, 16.
Corporations, ecclesiastical, II, 1 f.; 23 ff.; as plaintiffs, VII, 104; religious, III, 172 f.; summons, VII, 164; as to interdict, VIII, 211; appealing to council, VIII, 328 f.
Corpses, desecration of, VIII, 318.
Corpus Christi, as to interdict, VIII, 204.
Corpus Iuris Canonici, I, 43 f.
Correction, libelli, VII, 161; of delinquent, VII, 374 f.
Correptio iudicialis, VII, 374 f.; to neglectful pastors, VII, 466.
Council, general, condemned doctrine by, VIII, 291; appeal to, VIII, 328 f.
Councils, canons of, I, 16 ff.; general, II, 216 ff.; plenary, II, 297 f.; provincial, II, 300; proceedings, II, 223, 303.
Counsellors of religious, III, 147.
Counsel, defense, VII, 107 f.
Counterplea, VII, 79, 139 f.
Couriers, VII, 44; for summons, VII, 168.
Court, diocesan, II, 391 ff.; V, 406 ff.; Roman, II, 246 ff.; in marriage cases, V, 404 f.
Credentes, VIII, 288.
Cremation, IV, 231; VI, 101, 156.
Crimes, for religious trials, III, 400; occult (irregularity), IV, 505; marriage impediment, V, 195 ff.; forum competens, VII, 21; reasons for privation, II, 165; as to prescription, VII, 156; probable of pastors, VII, 418; occult for susp., ex inf. consc., VII, 479 f.
Crime, modern theories on, VIII, 2; definition of, VIII, 10 f.; gravity, VIII, 14 f.; public, VIII, 15; occult, ib.; notorious, VIII, 16 f.; secret, VIII, 17; ecclesiastical-civil-mixed, VIII, 18 f., 408 ff.; consequences of, VIII, 52 f.; inchoate, VIII, 55 f., 91.
Crimen, in criminoso, VIII, 352; falsi, VIII, 419 ff.
Criminal cases, method, VII, 69; defensor, VII, 108; quashed, VII, 149; procedure, VII, 3, 380 f.; act, VIII, 96 f.; type, VIII, 25; trials, VII, 355 ff.
Criminality, theories, VIII, 2 ff., 67 f.
Cross, veneration of, VI, 188; pectoral, VI, 252.
"Cruce elevata" at funerals, VI, 141.
Cubicula, for Mass, IV, 172.
Culpa gravis, VII, 413.
Cultus, per viam, VII, 385; non-cultus, VII, 394, 396; term, VI, 186 ff.
Cumulatio utilis, VII, 327.
Curates, II, 559 f.
Curatores, VII, 99.
Curia Romana, II, 246 ff.
Custom, I, 76 f., 106 ff.; as to marriage, V, 92; reprobated, VI, 490; IV, 535; VII, 34.

D

Damnum infectum, VII, 127.
Dances, Balls, II, 93.
Danger of Death, baptism, IV, 59, 71 f.; absolution, IV, 286 f.; VIII, 151 ff.; 232; complicis, VIII, 436 f.; marriage, V, 51, 96 ff.; 294 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Dataria Apostolica, II, 270.
Dawn, aurora, IV, 163.
Day, I, 116.
Deacons, ministers of Baptism, IV, 441; of h. Euch., IV, 213 f.; as to blessings, IV, 564.
Deambulatorium, interdict, VIII, 198.
Deans, deaneries, II, 201 f.; rural, II, 497 ff.
Death of former party, how proved, V, 176 f.
Debitum coniugale, V, 325 f.
Debts, contracted by religious, III, 187; XI, 193 f.; impeding entering religion, III, 212; on church property, VI, 603.
Decanatus, II, 201 f.
Deceit, in general, II, 32; novitiate (see dolus), III, 208.
Decisiva or dispositiva pars, I, 44.
Declaratio Benedictina, V, 269.
Declaratory sentence, VIII, 91, 103; 180; 182 f.; 189 f.; 192; 232; 356; 448.
Decorum of the House of God, VI, 46; neglect, VII, 465.
Decrees of Rom. Pontiffs, I, 13 f.; I, 16; in eccl. trials, VII, 484; appeal from, VIII, 328.
Decretals of Popes, I, 22; of Boniface VIII, I, 38 ff.; of Clement V, I, 40 ff.; of Gregory IX, I, 36 ff.; of Pseudo-Isidore, I, 24 ff.
Decretum Burchardi, I, 27; Ivonis Carnot, I, 29; Magistri Gratiani, I, 30 ff.
Decretum laudis, III, 51 ff.
Dedication of churches, VI, 19.
Defamation, excuse of penalty, VIII, 103; absolution in case of, VIII, 159.
Defects of body, IV, 480; of mind, IV, 482; of ordination, IV, 536 f.; of judicial sentence, VII, 330 f.
Defense of the case, VII, 303; gratuitous, VII, 344 f.; of pastor, VII, 426; of forbidden books, VIII, 295; condemned doctrine, VIII, 288, 290.
Defendant, at trials, VII, 95 f.; 108; when free, VII, 194; contempt, VII, 288 f.
Defensor vinculi, V, 412 ff.; 428 ff.; at trials, VII, 41 f.; exception to, VII, 65; calling witnesses, VII, 213; incidental questions, VII, 283.
Degradation, VIII, 262 f.; for apostasy, VIII, 276, 280; for violence, VIII, 378; for sollicitatio, VIII, 439; for attempted marriage, VIII, 477.
Degrees of affinity, V, 208 f.; of consanguinity, V, 202 f.; academic, VI, 420.
Delays in trials, VII, 81 f.
Delegation as to marriage, V, 282; to be mentioned, V, 134.
Delegates Apostolic, II, 284; priv. fori, VIII, 363 f.; priv. canonis, VIII, 376 f.
Delegated jurisdiction, II, 174 ff.; to be mentioned, V, 134.
Delegates, duties of, II, 182 f.
Delictum, VIII, 10 f.
Delinquents, VIII, 64 f.
Demonstrative, VI, 616; VII, 414; VIII, 244.
Denunciation of criminals, VII, 362 f.; of books, VI, 459 f.; of clerics-Freemasons, VIII, 346 f.; false, of solicitation, VIII, 424 ff.; obligation of, VIII, 440.
Deposition of clerics, VIII, 259 ff.; for apostates, VIII, 279; for desecration of sacred species, VIII, 304; for desecration of graves, VIII, 318.
Depositum fidei, VI, 319.
Desecration of Sacred Species, VIII, 301 ff.; of graves and corpses, VIII, 318 f.; of churches and cemeteries, VI, 35 f.; VIII, 319.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Desservants, II, 508; VII, 410; 445.
Determinism, VIII, 3.
Devolution of election, II, 147 f.; Vicar capitular, II, 482 f.
Diaria, VI, 441.
Didascalia Apostolorum, I, 20.
Dignitas, II, 426 f.
Dignities by excommunicated, VIII, 190, 192 f.; violated, VIII, 377; violating residence, VIII, 463; held by religious, III, 354.
Dilationes, VII, 71.
Diligence, in crime, VIII, 34 f.
Dimes, III, 29.
Dimissorial letters, IV, 425 ff.; recipients of, IV, 431 ff.; religious, IV, 434 ff.; penalty, VIII, 450 f.
Dioceses, erection of, II, 200 f.
Diocesan, domicile, II, 15 f.; institutions, III, 48; spread of, III, 81 f.
Dionysius Exiguus, I, 22.
Dionysio-Hadriana, ib.
Direct-indirect, VIII, 338, 383; absolution, VIII, 435 f.; violation of seal of confession, VIII, 442; as to visitation, VIII, 519.
Directors, confessors, IV, 306.
Disability, (disqualification), VIII, 246, 249 ff.; for clerics, VIII, 256.
Disciplinary way, IV, 552.
Disease, concerning engagements, V, 48; the debitum, V, 327 f.
Dismissal ipso facto, III, 384 f.; from confraternities, III, 437 f.; of religious with temporary vows, III, 387 f.; with perpetual vows, III, 301 f.; trial for, III, 396 ff.; of seminary students, VI, 410.
Disobedience, VIII, 324 f.
Disparity of Worship (cultus), V, 179 f.
Dispensations, I, 173 ff.; from irregularities, IV, 504 f.; of marriages, V, 95 ff.; of rel. superiors, III, 300 f.; from vows, marriage, V, 139; for forum internum, V, 110; papal, solves marriage, V, 345; right of petition, V, 421; feast and fast, VI, 163 f.; from vows, VI, 303; from oaths, VI, 316; from penalties, VIII, 107, 239 f.; from infamy, VIII, 248.
Disposal of property, III, 248.
Disposition for baptism, IV, 61.
Dissolution of engagements, V, 46 ff.; of marriage, V, 339 f.
Distributions, daily, II, 431 ff.
Diverse censures, VIII, 127.
Divine Office, II, 82 f.; of chapters, II, 452 f.; in semi-public oratories, VI, 77.
Divine offices, what, VIII, 167; exclusion from, VIII, 176 f.; in interdicted places, VIII, 203 ff.; admission to, VIII, 354 f.
Divine Savior, Society of, III, 18.
Divine Word, Society of, III, 18.
Division of parishes, VI, 506 f.; of property, VI, 558; of provinces, III, 79 f.;
Doctor's degrees, VI, 419 f.
Doctrina XII Apostolorum, I, 21.
Doctrine, VIII, 291.
Documents, authority of, VII, 259; investigation of, VII, 245; for matrimonial trials, V, 436; nature of, VII, 254; original, VII, 262; papal, VIII, 331; forgery of, VIII, 419 ff.; tampering with, VIII, 506 f.; neglect of, VIII, 508 f.
Dolus, in general, II, 32 f.; in crime, VIII, 23 f.; 26; in

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google profession, VIII, 474; in neglect, VIII, 493.

Domestic power, III, 103 f.
Domicellares, II, 425.
Domicile and law, I, 89 f.; II, 12 ff.; quasi-domicile, ib., II, 15 f.; as to ordination, IV, 419, 423; as to marriage, V, 57, 207 f.; as to trials, VII, 18.
Dominium radicale, III, 277 f.
Dominic, St., Dominicans, III, 12.
Domus formata, III, 48; regularis, ib.; religiosa, ib.
Donations, III, 181, 192 ff.; of religious, III, 285; refusal of, III, 305; who may make, VI, 570; of church property, VI, 601.
Dos required, III, 224 ff.
Double monasteries, III, 101 f.
Doubt of law, I, 104; positive, II, 188; in Extreme Unction, IV, 403; Baptism vs. Marriage, V, 184 f.; as to prescription; VII, 152; as to penalty, VIII, 79; as to censures, VIII, 131 f.; as to reservation, VIII, 138 f.
Dowry, III, 181, 224 ff.; of transferred religious, III, 368 f.; illegally expended, VIII, 516.
Dress, clerical, II, 84 f.; religious, III, 71; of laymen, III, 423; of postulants, III, 202; prohibition to wear, VIII, 259; neglect to, VIII, 458 f.
Drunkenness, VIII, 29; 100.
Dubia concordanda, VII, 174.
Dubium facti, I, 85; iuris, ib; legis, I, 104; positive, II, 188. (see Doubt) Duel, as to burial, VI, 155; penalty, VIII, 403 ff.
Dulia, VI, 187, 235.
Dummodo, clause, I, 128.
Duties of clergymen, II, 70 ff.; of religious, III, 298 ff.

E

Ecclesiastical crimes. VIII, 18 f.
Editor, VI, 432; 440 f.; 463; of liturgical books, VI, 191; 210; penalty, VIII, 296; 335.
Education, of clergy, VI, 374; of Christian youth, VI, 411 ff.; non-catholic, VIII, 297 f.; of religious, III, 292.
Election, acceptation of, II, 144 f.; of bishops, II, 119 ff.; devolution, II, 147 f.; effect, II, 143 f.; freedom, VIII, 483 f.; formalities, VIII, 487 f.; to parishes, II, 524; of Pope, II, 117 f.; VIII, 321 f.; ratification, II, 146 f.; of religious superiors, III, 121 f.; time and mode, II, 123 ff.
Eligible to offices, II, 127 ff.
Embezzlement, VIII, 389.
Emblems at funerals, VI, 141 f.
Emendatio libelli, VII, 161; 179.
Emphyteusis, VI, 607.
Enclosure, III, 310 ff.; exit from, III, 321 f.; violation of, VIII, 368 ff.
Encyclical letters, I, 15 f.
Endowment of churches, VI, 14 f.; of parishes, VI, 494.
Engagement, V, 37 ff.
Enmity against pastors, VII, 415; of witnesses, VII, 209.
Epikeia, I, 174.
Epileptics, ordination of, IV, 482.
Episcopus proprius, IV, 418 ff.; of religious, IV, 439; penalty, VIII, 450.
Equity, I, 100; II, 165; division of goods, VI, 559.
Erasure in documents, VII, 261.
Erection, of abbatia nullius, II, 200 f.; of diocese, ib.; of novitiate, III, 229 f.; of provinces, II, 200 f.; of religious institutes, III, 65 ff.; facti at trials, VII, 199.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Error, in general, II, 33; common, II, 188; in crime, VIII, 33 f.; condemned, VIII, 292 f.; in dispensation, V, 120 f.; in marriage, V, 231 ff.; in sentence, VII, 317.
Esteem, loss of, VII, 416.
Eucharist Holy, IV, 125 ff.; altar of Bl. Sacrament, VI, 218; exposition, VI, 227; keeping, VI, 213 f.; tabernacle, VI, 221.
Evidence, circumstantial, VII, 268 ff.; gravis, levis, violenta, VII, 272.
Evil purpose, VIII, 303.
Exactions for administering Sacraments, IV, 31.
Examen sponsorum, V, 52 ff.
Examination, bridal, V, 52 ff.; of junior clergy, II, 74 ff.; before ordination, IV, 521 f.; of pastors, II, 529 f.; for preaching, VI, 356; refusal of, VIII, 454 f.
Examiners in certain cases, VII, 406; in concubinage, VII, 462; neglect of pastors, VII, 467; non-resident clergy, VII, 456; invitation to resign, VII, 419, 427; synodal-prosynodal, II, 419 f.; of witnesses, VII, 223.
Excardination, II, 52 ff.
Ex cathedra, VI, 323, 326.
Exceptions, in court, VII, 77 f.; to judge, VII, 60 ff.
Exchange, of benefices. VI, 544; of offices, II, 168; of property, VI, 604; excipere, as to marriage, V, 281.
Exclaustratio, III, 373 f.
Excommunication, VIII, 164 f.; history, VIII, 168 ff.; nature, division, VIII. 170 f.; effects, VIII, 172 ff.; excepted from correction, VII, 377; as to burial, VI, 39; as to trials, VII, 105; definition, VIII, 171; inseparable, VIII, 175 ff.; minor, VIII, 169, 172.
Execution, of dispensation, V, 128; of sentence, VII, 346 f.; of papal documents, VIII, 332; of pious bequests, VIII, 395.
Executor, of rescripts, I, 125 f.; 141 f.; of sentence, VII, 346 f.
Exemption, history of, III, 24 ff.; as to interdict, VIII, 200; 208; from parish, II, 543 f.; of religious, III, 336.
Exequies, VI, 115; 158.
Exhibition of documents, VII, 265 f.
Exhumation, VI, 159.
Exit from enclosure, III, 321 f.
Ex nunc-ex tunc, V, 391.
Exorcisms, IV, 567.
Expectativae, II, 107.
Expenses, of experts, VII, 249; for trials, VII, 339 ff.; witnesses, VII, 234.
Experts, in certain cases, VII, 408; in marriage cases, V, 427; in trials, VII, 241 ff.
Exploratio voluntatis, III, 227 f.; neglected. VIII, 516.
Expositi (exposed children), IV, 52.
Exposition, of Bl. Sacrament, VI, 227 ff.; of false relics. VIII, 316.
Express jurisdiction, IV, 277.
Extravagantes Communes, I, 42; Ioannis XXII, ib.
External act, VIII, 115.
Extreme Unction, anointings, IV, 407; minister, IV, 398; to religious, III, 141 f.; subject of, IV, 401 ff.; rites, IV, 406.
Eyewitness, VII, 236 f.

F

Faculties, in general, I, 159; 183; for absolving from censures, VIII, 157; of Apostolic Delegate, I, 265 ff.; of our Ordinaries, I, 255 ff.; V,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

112 ff.; cumulative, V, 115 ff.; marriage, V, 112 ff.; schools, VI, 419; reading books, VI, 478.
Faith, crimes against, VIII, 275 ff.; no compulsion, VI, 371; object of, VI, 328; profession of, VI, 329; 485; VIII, 503 f.; danger to, VI, 328.
Falsa denuntiatio, IV, 318 f.
Falsifiers, VIII, 420 f.
Familia Pontificia, II, 338 f.
Familiares, as to offices, II, 115; of pastors, VII, 417; Rom. Pontiff, II, 338 f.; of religious, III, 143.
Fast, VI, 160 ff.; before h. communion, IV, 234 f.; before Mass, IV, 141 f.; violation of, VIII, 304 f.; days of, VI, 179; diocesan indults, VI, 184 ff.; III, 345; dispensation from, VI, 163; law of, VI, 177; religious, VI, 184.
Fatalia, VII, 81.
Fautores, VIII, 288.
Favor iuris, in marriage, V, 19; to baptism, V, 184 f.
Favors by excommunicated, VIII, 188 f.; 191; given to, VIII, 353.
Fear, in chapter acts, II, 29 f.; in crime, VIII, 40 f.; extorted pardon, VIII, 111, marriage, V, 243 ff.; 281; novitiate, III, 207; ordination, II, 194 ff.; IV, 541; 551; profession, III, 256.
Feasts, of Apostles, IV, 533; dispensations, VI, 163; holy-days of obligation, VI, 171 f.; as to interdict, VIII, 204; obligations on, VI, 172; as to ordination, IV, 532 f.; origin of, VI, 160; in private oratories, VI, 80; reckoning of, VI, 168; titular, VI, 27.
Fees, for entering church, VI, 50; for funerals, VI, 144 f.
Ferendae sententiae, VIII, 74; 77, 91 f.; as to degradation, VIII, 263; as to deposition, VIII, 261; as to presumptive censures, VIII, 166; as to vindictive penalties, VIII, 237; as to suspension, VIII, 218; for various crimes, VIII, 279; 287; 304; 305; 318; 319; 326; 339; 349; 374; 378; 392; 394; 416; 418; 444; 459; 474; 481; 492.
Feria, feast, VI, 160; for trials, VII, 85.
Fetus, as to baptism, IV, 49 f.; as to abortion, VIII, 398.
Fictio iuris, V, 391; VIII, 165.
Figura et species matrimonii, V, 213; in renewal of consent, V, 383; sanatio, V, 395.
Fines, VIII, 250 f.
First Holy Mass, IV, 150.
Fitness for religious state, III, 199 f.
Folia, VI, 437; 441.
Font, baptismal, IV, 88 f.
Fontes cognoscendi, I, 14 ff.; essendi, I, 10 f.
Forgery, VIII, 419 ff.
Fori, privilegium, II, 59 f.; VIII, 363 ff.
Form of baptism, IV, 69; of altar-bread, IV, 154; of ordination, IV, 539 f.; of matrimony, V, 12; 265 ff.
Formalities, for alienation, VI, 599; for approving rel. institutes, III, 49; for changing rel. houses, III, 93; at election neglected, VIII, 490; for pious foundations, VI, 613; for parish division, VI, 515; for religious profession, III, 263 f.
Formula of baptism, IV, 35; of religious profession, III, 265.
Formularies for petitions, V, 440 ff.
Forty Hours Devotion, IV, 368; VI, 233 f.
Forum competens, VII, 11; ad deducta, IV, 505; exter-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

num-internum, II, 181 ff.; VIII, 77; absolution in both, VIII, 148 f.; from apostasy, heresy, schism, VIII, 280; jurisdiction, VIII, 338.
Foundations, pious, VI, 610.
Fractura enormis, VI, 95.
Francis, St., Franciscans, III, 10 f.
Freedom, for clerical state, IV, 451; of conscience, V, 156 f.; VIII, 521; of election, VIII, 484 f.
Freemasons, sects of, III, 427 f.; absolution, IV, 296 f.; burial, VI, 154; h. Communion, IV, 232; cremation, VI, 101; marriage, V, 155 f.; penalty, VIII, 339.
Free status, as to marriage, V, 70 f.; 286.
Fructus, VIII, 391.
Frustrated crime, VIII, 57.
Fugitives, religious, III, 381 f.; penalty, VIII, 472.
Fundatae missae, IV, 183 f.
Funds of churches, VI, 61 f.; of disabled priests, VII, 434 ff.
Funeral rites, ancient, VI, 101; eccles., VI, 115 ff.; 139; of beneficiaries, VI, 121; of cardinals, bishops, VI, 120; of religious, VI. 122; of guests and students, VI, 124; fees, VI, 144 f.; mourners and emblems, VI, 141; processions, VI, 140; conveying of bodies, VI, 115.
Furiosi, as to baptism, IV, 62.

G

Gambling forbidden, II, 97.
Games, II, 87.
General superior, III, 114 f.
Gifts, to religious, III, 278: for judges, VII, 71.
Glagolitic language, IV, 159.
Glossae, Glossatores, I, 52 ff.
Godparents, see patrini; as to marriage, V, 216 f.
Good Friday, Mass, IV, 161; VI, 220.
Good Shepherd Sisters, III, 22.
Government of religious, III, 95.
Gratian's Decree, I, 30 ff.
Graves, desecration of, VIII, 318.
Gravity, of censure, VIII, 115 f.; of crime, VIII, 14 f.
Guardians, of children, IV, 54; of minors in court, VII, 97 ff.; non-catholic, VIII, 297 f.; choice of burial, VI, 127; of religious, III, 105.
Guests, burial of, VI, 124; in private oratories, VI, 82; in religious houses, III, 141 f.
Guilt, VIII, 11; 24 f.

H

Habiles-inhabiles iure, III, 116 f.; V, 224.
Habit of novices, III, 236; of religious, III, 71; 309 f.
Handling of s. vessels, VI, 286.
Hatred of people, VII, 415.
Hattonis Capitulare, I, 27.
Heads uncovered, VI, 205.
Heretics, as to administration of Sacraments, IV, 21; books of, VI, 468; 483; burial, VI, 153; VIII, 360; churches of, IV, 173; cooperation with, VIII, 287 ff.; definition of, VI, 334; marriage, V, 144; 299; Mass for, IV, 143; penalty, VIII, 276 f.; 295; orders received from, VIII, 448.
Hermaphrodites, IV, 445; V, 172 f.
Hierarchy, II, 7; 41.
Hieronymites, III, 13.
Holydays, VI, 170 ff.
Holy Ghost, Fathers of the, III, 18.
Holy Office, II, 250; IV, 551; V, 406, III, 110.
Holy Saturday, Mass, IV, 161 f.
Holy Writ, I, 12 f.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Homicide, desecration by, VI, 36; irregularity, IV, 488 f.; penalty, VIII, 409.
Hospitallers, Brothers, III, 17.
Hospitals, III, 67; VI, 387; 546.
Hour, for saying Mass, IV, 162 f.
House, religious, III, 48; V, 280; 322; support of, III, 82 f.; permission, III, 86 f.; of novitiate, III, 231 f.
Hunting, chase, II, 87.
Hyperdulia, VI, 187; 235.
Hypnotism, VIII, 29.

I

Idoneus, for office, II, 111.
Ignorance, in law, I, 85 ff.; as to crime, VIII, 23; 31 ff.; 98 ff.; affected-crass-supine, VIII, 32 f.; 98 ff.; invincible-vincible, ib.; of confessor, VIII, 138; in attempted marriage, VIII, 478; of impediments, V, 392; no excuse, IV, 501; not presumed, V, 229.
Illegitimate, as to baptism, IV, 94; as to ordination, IV, 478 f.; as to religious state, III, 214; various kinds, V, 333.
Illustres, VII, 222.
Images, censorship of, VI, 437; forbidden, VI, 475; of Saints, VI, 239; 242 f.
Imbecility of mind, VIII, 31; 100.
Immunity, of clergy, II, 64; of sacred places, VI, 9.
Impede (impedire), VIII, 331; 337; church property, VIII, 390; exercise of jurisdiction, VIII, 348 f.
Impediments, in general, V, 82 ff.; civil authority, V, 27 ff.; classification, V, 93 f.; concurrence of, V, 118 f.; diriment, V, 83; 162 ff.; impediens, V, 83; 135 ff.; ignorance of, V, 392; occult-public, V, 84; 384; power to establish, V, 90 f.; in renewal of consent, V, 381; to orders, IV, 496 f.; to religious state, III, 214.
Imperitia, inexperience, II, 570; VII, 414.
Impotency, impediment, V, 164 ff.; reason for dispensation, V, 345; competent court, V, 405.
Imprimatur, VI, 438; 452.
Impuberes, who, II, 10; as to h. Communion, IV, 239; in court, VII, 99 f.; as to crime, VIII, 37; 100; as to enclosure, VIII, 370; for election, II, 129 f.; as to marriage, V, 162 f.; 244.
Imputability, as to crime, VIII, 11 f.; 23 ff.; reasons diminishing, VIII, 76 f.
Inadvertence, VIII, 33.
Incardination, II, 50 ff.; of religious, III, 288; 376 f.
Incidental, VII, 282; 333.
Incitement to insubordination, VIII, 347 f.
"In coena Domini," VIII, 4.
Incompetency, absolute-relative, VII, 13 f.; 63; sentence, VII, 329.
Incompatible offices, II, 113 f.; VIII, 497 f.
Inconvenience, V, 295; VII, 474; VIII, 41.
Incorrigibility, III, 400 f.
In devolutivo, II, 521; appeal, VII, 326; in penalties, VIII, 121.
Indictment, VII, 360.
Indignus, for election, VIII, 487; in rescripts, I, 144.
Indifferentists, as to marriage, V, 154 f.
Indissolubility of marriage, V, 16 f.
Indults, I, 75; for religious, III, 345; for domestic oratories, VI, 80.
Indulgences, applicable to dead,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

IV, 387; collections of, IV, 373 f.; at dedication of church, VI, 24; by excommunicated, VIII, 184; gaining of, VI, 381 ff.; grant, IV, 354 ff.; loss, VI, 379; plenary-partial, IV, 375; promulgation, IV, 370 ff.; transfer of feasts, IV, 376 f.; traffick in, VIII, 316; visit of oratories, IV, 385; works prescribed, IV, 381 f.; 390.
Industria personae, I, 146.
Infallibility in teaching, VI, 323.
Infamy, civil, VIII, 248; of fact, VIII, 245; IV, 500; of law, VIII, 245; IV, 483; for apostasy, VIII, 276; 280; for desecration, VIII, 304; 318; for duelling, VIII, 405; for immoral crimes, VIII, 414; for violence, VIII, 378 f.; of witnesses, VII, 208 f.
Infantes, II, 10 f.; as to Bapt., IV, 47 f.
Infidels, children of, IV, 53 f.; Mass for, IV, 141.
Infirmity, bodily, mental, VII, 415.
Informata conscientia ex, suspension, VII, 469 ff.; VIII, 121 f.
Informationes, VII, 305 f.
Information-process in Beatification, VII, 392; 396.
Ingressus, benefices, VI, 543; VII, 424; ab ecclesia interdict, VIII, 215; 245.
Inhibition, VII, 124; 298.
Iniuriae, actions, VII, 149 f.
Injury, mutual, VIII, 77; to persons, VIII, 376; public verbal, VIII, 380 f.; verbal private, VIII, 410 f.
Innocent of cause of interdict, VIII, 214.
Inquest, VII, 366 f.
Inquisition, VIII, 64.
Inquisitor, VII, 366 f.
Insanity, as to baptism, VI, 62 ff.; as to crime, VIII, 27 f.
Inscriptions, I, 44.
Insigne, capitulum, II, 428.
Insignia, of canons, II, 445; of Pope, II, 214 f.
In solidum, II, 185.
Insolvent clergy, II, 67 f.
Inspection, bodily, V, 424 f.; of schools, VI, 426; loyal, VII, 250.
Installation, of benefices, VI, 521; of offices, II, 106; neglect of, VIII, 494 f.
Instance first, second, VII, 25; 46; 326 f.
Instigators to crime, VIII, 50.
Institution, neglect of, VII, 532; VIII, 492 f.
Institutions, non-corporate, VI, 546 f.
Instructions, catechetical, VI, 343 f.; religious, VI, 423; of religious, III, 129 f.
Instructor actorum, VII, 39.
Instrumenta at trials, VII, 253 ff.
Instruments for ordination, IV, 537 f.
In suspensivo, appeals, II, 521; VII, 326; as to penalties, VIII, 123; 238.
Intention, of the donor, IV, 180 f.; for gaining indulgences, IV, 382; habitual, IV, 177; for marriage, V, 239 f.; for ordination, IV, 541 f.
Intentionarius, IV, 201; 210.
Intercourse, social, with excommunicated, VIII, 193 f.
Interdict, history, definition, VIII, 164; 184 f.; 195 f.; division. VIII, 197 f.; who may inflict it, VIII, 198 f.; effect, extent, VIII, 200 ff.; modifications, VIII, 204 f.; personal, VIII, 209 ff.; safeguarded, VIII, 354 f.; vindictive, VIII, 245.
Interest, VI, 608.
Interference of third person, VII, 332; in election, VIII, 485 f.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Interlocutory sentence, VII, 309; 315.
Internuncios, Apostolic, II, 284.
Interpellation, V, 352 ff.
Interpretation, of laws, I, 93 ff.; of oaths, VI, 316; of penalties, VIII, 78 f.; of rescripts, I, 136 ff.
Interpreter, for confession, IV, 340; at court, VII, 88; for marriage, V, 252.
Interrogatories of witnesses, VII, 225 f.
Interruption, of acts in censure, VIII, 126; of lawsuits, VII, 181; of novitiate, III, 233 f.
Interstices, IV, 461 ff.
Intervention at court, VII, 295 f.
Intimation, of removal, VII, 443; of summons, VII, 166.
In titulum, parish, II, 510.
Intra annum, IV, 199 f.
Introductio in clausuram, VIII, 370 ff.; corporalis, II, 106.
Introduction of a case, VII, 396 f.
Investment of money, III, 181.
Invitation to resign, VII, 419 f.
Investiture, II, 105.
Invocative blessing, IV, 566.
Irregularity, IV, 476 ff.; ex defectu, IV, 478 f.; ex delicto, IV, 484 f.; when incurred, IV, 495; ignorance, no excuse, IV, 501; multiplied, IV, 502; Ordinary's power, IV, 504 f.; sentence ex informata conscientia, VII, 477; from excommunication, VIII, 191; from interdict, VIII, 213; from infamy, VIII, 246; from administration of sacraments, VIII, 430.
Irritantes, leges, I, 84 ff.
Irritum, rescriptum, I, 135 f.
Irritation of vows, VI, 299.
Issue in pleading, effects of, VII, 173 ff., 176.
Ivonis Carnotensis Decretum, Panormia, I, 29.
Ianuis clausis, VIII, 205.
Iubilati, canons, II, 456 ff.
Iudex instructor, V, 431, VII, 26.
Iudicium ecclesiasticum, VII, 3.
Iuramentum aestimatorium, VII, 278; decisorium. VII, 279; suppletorium, VII, 274 f.
Ius canonicum, ecclesiasticum, pontificium, I, 1 ff.; ad rem in re (see Law), II, 145, 153; VIII, 493 f.; gladii, VIII, 63 f.; metatus, II, 67; VI, 10; patronatus, II, 106; 115; VI, 524 ff.
Iustitiae titulus, IV, 78.

J

Joseph, St., marriage of, III, 259 f.; Sisters of, III, 22.
Judge, body of, V, 416; VII, 34 f.; competency, exceptions, VII, 59 f.; duties of, VII, 66; in matrimonial cases, V, 411 f.; penalties for, VII, 72; in penal laws, VIII, 83; 240; a quo, ad quem, VII, 321 f.; as to sentence, VII, 311 f.; VIII, 88 f.
Judiciary form, VII, 285; 474; way, IV, 552.
Jurisdiction, contentious-voluntary, II, 180; ordinary-delegated, II, 171 f.; 174 f.; cessation, II, 187 f.; interpretation, II, 177 f.; for confession, IV, 252; 255; 260; of excommunicated, VIII, 189 f.; suspension from, VIII, 221; impeded, VIII, 331; 337; 338; of religious superiors, III, 103 f.; extent, II, 179 f.

K

Kleptomania, VIII, 29.
Knowledge, through confes-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

sion, IV, 303; deposition of witnesses, VII, 226 f.; of invalidity of marriage, V, 238; required for orders, IV, 457 f.; as to crime (see ignorance), VIII, 24.

L

Lacticinia, VI, 182.
Lacunae legis, VIII, 78.
Language, liturgical, IV, 157.
Lapsi, VIII, 42.
Latae sententiae, VIII, 74; 77; 92; 279; 287; 308; 317; 408; 459; excommunicati vitandi, VIII, 174 f.; multiplied censures, VIII, 125 f.; for degradation, VIII, 263; for deposition, VIII, 261; presumed, VIII, 166; in remitting penalties, VIII, 109; suspension, VIII, 318; vindictive penalties, VIII, 227; 237; 240.
Latria, VI, 187.
Laudatio delicti, VIII, 52.
Laurin, I, 18.
Law, appeal from, VIII, 328; 335 ff.; canon, study of, I, 1 ff.; 49 ff.; civil, I, 100; collections of, I, 20 ff.; cessation, I, 103; definition, division, I, 2 ff.; 80 f.; ecclesiastical merely, I, 87; of Guarantees, I, 235 ff.; VIII, 385; natural, I, 11; general-particular, I, 89; private-public, I, 80; 103; interpretation, I, 93 f.; obligation, I, 4; 83 ff.; promulgation, I, 80 f.; old and new, I, 60 ff.; 77 f.; science, I, 6 ff.; sources, I, 9 ff.; penal, I, 98 f., subject, I, 87 f.; unwritten, I, 17.
Lawgivers not subject to penalties, VIII, 94.
Lawsuits for church-property, VI, 588.
Lay-brothers, III, 109.
Lay-judge, in crime, VIII, 364; in marriage cases, V, 402.
Laymen, laity, name, II, 42; associations, III, 425 ff.; as to books, VI, 443; distributing h. Communion, IV, 214; as to censures, VIII, 166; as to election, II, 57; saying Mass and trafficking in stipends, VIII, 305; 311; forbidden to preach, VI, 362; as to offices, II, 57; reduction to lay-state, II, 193 f.; their rights, III, 421 ff.
Lazarists, III, 18.
Leaving religious state, III, 371 f.
Lectura arboris, V, 202.
Legal actions, III, 194.
Legates of R. Pontiff, II, 278 f.; their privileges, II, 62; VIII, 365; 379.
Legitimation of children, V, 98; 119 f.; 335 ff.
Lenten fast, VI, 180 ff.; preaching, VI, 367.
Lethargy, IV, 64.
Letters, admonition by, VII, 405; apostolic, VIII, 296; dimissorial, IV, 425 ff.; VIII, 450; 513; registered, VIII, 268; of religious, III, 330; testimonials, IV, 513 ff.
Levare in baptismum, IV, 80.
Levis vivendi ratio, VII, 417.
Lex dioecesana-iurisdictionis III, 38.
Libellus, change of, VI, 441; VII, 178; 157 ff.; pacis, IV, 336.
Liber Sextus, Septimus, I, 38 ff.; 47.
Liberty of Church violated, VIII, 334 f.; 376.
Licentia for hearing confessions, IV, 252.
Life in common, III, 45 f.; 303 f.
Ligamen, impediment, V, 173 ff.
Light, tabernacle, VI, 225.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Limit of jurisdiction, IV, 275 f.
Limbs amputated, VI, 101.
Lines, of affinity, V, 208; of consanguinity, V, 202; collateral, V, 204 f.; direct, V, 202 f.
Litanies approved, VI, 198 f.
Literature of Canon Law, I, 52 f.; 56 ff.
Litis contestatio, VII, 173 ff.; instantia, VII, 180 f.
Litterae dimissoriae, IV, 425 ff.; gratiae-iustitiae, I, 14; 124; testimoniales, IV, 513 ff.
Liturgical time, I, 115 f.
Liturgy, approbation of, VI, 190 f.; books of, I, 73 f.; of Orientals, IV, 27 f.; time, I, 115 f.
Loaning of sacred things, VI, 603.
Loreto, Sisters of, III, 22.

M

Machinari, VIII, 342.
Magisterium Ecclesiae, VI, 318 ff.
Mail, registered, for summons, VII, 169.
Majority vote, II, 26.
Management, forbidden, II, 91.
Mandans, as to abortion, VIII, 400; as to burial, VIII, 358 f.; as to crime, VIII, 50; as to elections, VIII, 484; as to marriage, V, 251 f.; as to rescripts, I, 150; in usurpation, VIII, 388.
Mandatum apostolicum I, 145; de consecrando, IV, 414; VIII, 444.
Mandate of attorneys, VII, 113; ad lites, VII, 114.
Mansionarii, II, 427; 429.
Manualia stipendia, IV, 183 f.
Manufacturing of relics, VIII, 315.
Maranatha, VIII, 170.
Mare Magnum, III, 36 f.
Marists, III, 18.
Marriage, bona of, V, 12 f.; canonical reasons, V, 124 ff.; civil, V, 4 f.; of clerics and religious, III, 209; IV, 487; V, 187 ff.; VIII, 475 ff.; of conscience, V, 315 ff.; contract, V, 13; definition, V, 2 f.; effects of, V, 524 ff.; end of, V, 12; by excommunicated, VIII, 182; impediments, V, 81 ff.; instructions, V, 49; 78; mixed, q. v. names, V, 15; mixed, forbidden, VIII, 297 f., 452 f.; as bigamy, VIII, 412; power of Church and State, V, 22 ff.; 27 f.; properties, unity, indissolubility, V, 16 f.; revalidation, V, 379 ff.; sacrament, V, 12; tie, dissolved, V, 173 f.; 367 f.; vow of virginity, V, 258; second marriage, V, 397 f.
Martyrs, VII, 386; 398.
Mary, Bl. Virgin, VI, 187, 235.
Mass Holy, IV, 126 ff.; application of, IV, 142 ff.; bination, IV, 134 ff.; concelebration, IV, 127 f.; disposition, IV, 140; fast before, IV, 141; first, IV, 149; for excommunicated persons, VIII, 185 f.; by non-priests, VIII, 305 f.; obligation of saying, hearing, IV, 132; VI, 172 f.; preparation-thanksgiving, IV, 146; reduction of, VI, 615 f.; vestments, IV, 147 f.; without server, IV, 150; pro populo, II, 360 f.; 455; 492; 549 ff.; conventual, II, 455; III, 325; ordination, IV, 529; private, solemn, conventual, lecta, parochial, IV, 215 f.; pro sponso et sponsa, V, 307; 398; vicar-capit., II, 492.
Master of novices, III, 239 ff.
Maternity homes, III, 67.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Matrimonium, consummatum, ratum, V, 21; 341 ff.; 430; legitimum, putativum, ib.; conscientiae, V, 315 f.; figura et species, V, 213; baptizatorum, V, 22 f.; bona, V, 12 f.; competent court, V, 405 f.
Matter, of baptism, IV, 67 f.; confirmation, IV, 97 f.; h. Eucharist, IV, 152 f.; penance, IV, 338; extreme Unction, IV, 396 f.; matrimony, V, 11 f.; spiritual, mixed, VII, 4; 8; 99.
"Maxima cura," VII, 405 ff.
Medicine, forbidden, II, 89.
Mendicants, exemption, origin, III, 12; 34 ff.; property-right, III, 177 f.; 283; precedence, II, 40; III, 63 f.; quest, III, 83 f.; 347 f.
Mens rea, VIII, 32; 47.
Mercedarians, III, 13.
Method of procedure, VII, 9; in civil cases, VII, 68; in criminal cases, VII, 69; 355 ff.
Metropolitans, name, rights etc., II, 288 ff.; coercive power, VIII, 85; devolutive power, II, 481 f.; 485 f.; privilegium canonis, VIII, 376 f.
Midwives, in marriage trials, V, 425.
Military, chaplains, II, 514; as to marriage, V, 280; orders, III, 23; service, II, 65 f.; 93 f.; IV, 499.
Minimi, III, 12.
Minister, of baptism, IV, 37 ff.; 41 f.; of confirmation, IV, 100 f.; of penance, IV, 251 f.; of sacramentals, IV, 560; disqualified by infamy, VIII, 246 f.; suspended from ministry, VIII, 222 f.
Minors, in court, VII, 97 f.; in law, II, 10 ff.; summons, VII, 164.
Minor orders to religious, III, 352 f.
Miracles, VII, 399; 402.
Missarum solemnia, V, 62; 307.
Missio canonica, VI, 341; VIII, 189.
Missions, VI, 370 ff.
Mistakes in rescripts, I, 135 f.
Mixed marriage, conditions, V, 147 f.; duties of pastors, V, 153; non-catholic ministers, V, 149 f.; as to form, V, 300; reasons for forbidding, V, 142; rites, V, 208 f.; penalty, VIII, 297 f.; 452 f.
Mixti fori, matter of, VII, 8; 357; VIII, 21.
Moderamen inculpatae tutelae, VIII, 42.
Moderari publicationes, VI, 440.
Moderation in censures, VIII, 132.
Modo, specialissimo, speciali, simplici, VIII, 131 f.
Monasticism, III, 1 f.
Moniales, Nuns. III, 48; churches of, VI, 129.
Monsters, IV, 52.
Month, I, 116.
Mortal sins, IV, 338.
Mortgages, VI, 603.
"Motu proprio," I, 14; clause, I, 133 f.
Mourners, VI, 141 f.
Multiplication of censures, VIII, 124 f.
Munera sordida, II, 66 f.
Music, church, VI, 208 ff.
Mutes, as to indulgences, IV, 395.

N

Names, Christian for baptism, IV, 73 f.; of religious institutes, III, 73.
Necessitas medii, IV, 33; VI, 321.
Necessity of absolution, VIII, 141.
Neglect, of appointment, II,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

116; abbatial blessing, VIII, 503; decorum, VII, 465; ceremonies, VIII, 456 f.; episcopal consecration, VIII, 499; installation, VIII, 494 f.; ratification, VIII, 492.
Negotiatio, forbidden, II, 95 ff.; VIII, 460 f.; with Masses, IV, 186.
Neophytes, II, 13; IV, 500.
Nomination of indignus, VIII, 174; 487.
Nomocanones, I, 21.
Non-catholics, children, IV, 56; education, VIII, 297 f.; as to marriage, V, 302; as to orders, IV, 498; as to Sacraments, IV, 567; schools, VI, 414; sects, VIII, 276; not subject to censures, VIII, 114 f.
Notary, diocesan, II, 409 f.; at trials, VII, 40; 405; public, II, 90; of religious, III, 115 f.
Notoriety, of fact, VIII, 16 f.; 448; of law, VIII, 15 f.
Notorious, I, 86; VIII, 16; crime, VII, 480; VIII, 16; 459; apostasy, V, 155; VI, 153; concubinage, V, 213; and external, III, 401; unbecoming state, VIII, 459.
Notre Dame Sisters, III, 22.
Novice-masters, confessors, IV, 306.
Novices, as to burial, VI, 137; as to privileges, III, 243 f.
Novitiate, admission to, III, 205 ff.; 214 f.; ending of, III, 250; erection, III, 229; exploratio voluntatis, III, 227; interruption, III, 233 f.; master of novices, III, 237 ff.; requisites for validity, III, 231 f.
Novi operis nuntiatio, VII, 127.
Nullity, complaint of, VII, 56; 328 f.
Number of crimes, VIII, 91.
Nuns, (moniales), III, 48; VIII, 374 f.
Nuncios Apostolic, II, 284.
Nuptiae, V, 2 f.

O

Oath, definition of, VI, 310; communicatio in sacris, VI, 195; in certain cases, formula, VII, 406; at election of religious superiors, III, 123; dispensation from, VI, 316; of dignitaries, of loyalty, refusal, II, 347; VIII, 498; interpretation of, VI, 316; obligation, VI, 312; ordination, IV, 423; 473; supplementary for free status, V, 74; of parties, VII, 274; at trials, VII, 69; 188 f.; by witnesses, VII, 218.
Obedience, clerical, II, 71; religious, III, 45; effects of vow of, III, 274 f.; 302.
Oblates of Immac. Conception, III, 18; of Tor de' Specchi, III, 19.
Obreptio in rescripts, I, 131.
Observants, III, 11.
Occidental Church, celibacy, II, 79.
Occult, crime, VIII, 15 f.; dispensation, VIII, 240; of secret societies, VIII, 343 f.; absolutio complicis, VIII, 437.
Occupations, unbecoming the clergy, II, 85 ff.; unbecoming the Sisters, III, 67.
Oeconomus of parish, II, 564 f.; of religious, III, 148; as to marriage, V, 273.
Offences of religious, grievous, III, 400.
Offerings to churches, VI, 53; 55; to s. supellex, VI, 281.
Office (officium), definition, II, 100 f.; 426; appointment free, II, 104 ff.; 109 ff.; du-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google ration of, for religious superiors, III, 119; exchange, of, II, 168 f.; incompatibility of, II, 113 f.; VIII, 497 f.; loss of, II, 154 ff.; 163 ff.; by excommunicated, VIII, 190 f.; requisites for, II, 111, 534; retention illegal, VIII, 502; suspension from, VIII, 218 ff.; time for appointment, II, 112; transfer of, II, 167 f.; vacancy of, II, 107; in writing, II, 117.

Officialis, II, 391; VII, 29 f.
Officials, higher, of Roman Court, VIII, 365 ff.; aiders in crime, VIII, 51; bribery of, VIII, 510.
"Officiorum ac munerum," of Leo XIII, VI, 430 ff.
Oils, holy, IV, 28 f.
Olivetans, III, 14.
Omission of duties, VIII, 511.
Onanism, V, 259.
Opinio communis, I, 101.
Opportune, IV, 19.
Option of cardinals, II, 235; of canons, II, 434 f.
Oratorians, III, 18.
Oratories, definition and division, VI, 65 f.; as to indulgences, IV, 367; 385; keeping of Bl. Sacrament, VI, 216; private, VI, 78; public, VI, 70; semipublic VI, 72.
Order (ordo religiosus), III, 47.
Orders, in general, holy, IV, 409 ff.; minister of, IV, 412 ff.; requisites, IV, 512 ff.; rites and ceremonies, IV, 528 ff.; subject of, IV, 444 ff.; time and place, IV, 532 ff.; marriage impediment, V, 187 f.; by excommunicated, VIII, 191; suspension from VIII, 221 f.; simoniacal, VIII, 445; from censured, VIII, 447 f.; illegal administration, reception, VIII, 450 ff.; per saltum, IV, 460; VIII, 451.
Ordinare, ordo, ordinatio, IV, 410 f.
Ordinances, appeal from, VIII, 328.
Ordinaries, as to absolution: in normal cases, VIII, 156; in occult cases, VIII, 110; in public cases, VIII, 109; as to administration: alienation, III, 188; V, 592 ff.; VIII, 393; altars, consecration of, VI, 92; appointment to offices, II, 104 ff.; beatification, VII, 390 f.; 407; cemeteries, blessing of, VI, 104; censures of books, VI, 434 ff.; 476; VIII, 296; churches, building, consecration of, VI, 3 f.; 13; 92; corner-stone blessing, VI, 16; examination of ordinands, IV, 523; fasts and feasts, VI, 162 f.; house of God, VI, 46; images, blessing of, VI, 243; indulgences, IV, 357 ff.; irregularities, dispensation from IV, 504 f.; liturgy, VI, 201; Mass, permission for saying, IV, 171 f.; Mass-stipends, IV, 191 f.; 209 f.; marriage, banns, V, 66; formalities, V, 87 f.; 96 f.; 106; 112 f.; 274; Pauline privilege, V, 368 f.; sanatio, V, 369; trials, V, 407 f.; pensions, VI, 513; pious foundations, last wills, VI, 612 f.; 571 f.; preaching, VI, 351 f.; property of churches, VI, 578; religious institutions, foundation of, III, 87; religious subject to, III, 99 f.; 125 f.; 526 f.; election of superiors, III, 124; property, III, 179 f.; power over houses, III, 341 ff.; dismissal of, III, 391 f.; visit of, III, 136 f.; confraternities, III, 432 f.;

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google schools, VI, 424 ff.; seminaries, VI, 388; sacramentals, IV, 569; Sacrament, Bl., keeping of, VI, 217; taxes and levies, VI, 561 ff.; testimonials, IV, 513 ff.; Dispensations and faculties: I, 178; IV, 261 f.; q.v. Judiciary power: removal of pastors, VII, 425 ff.; priests' fund, VII, 436 ff.; transfer of pastors, VII, 446 ff.; executor of sentence, VII, 348; plaintiff, VII, 103 f.; criminal inquest, VII, 369; suspension ex informata conscientia, VII, 470 ff.; Reservation: of sins, IV, 316; of censures by law, VIII, 130; of papal cases, VIII, 135 f.; restriction of, VIII, 134 f.; Coercive Power: as to interdict, VIII, 199; as to penal remedies, VIII, 268; as to penalties adding, pardoning, VIII, 294; 107; as to penances, VIII, 273; as to suspension, VIII, 228; as to various crimes, q.v. (see Bishop).

Ordines maiores, minores, II, 44; 41.

Orientals, and the Code, I, 72 f.; absolutio complicis, VIII, 437; begging, III, 349; bread for Sacrifice, IV, 222 f.; celibacy, II, 79; Freemasons, VIII, 343; liturgy, IV, 27 f.; marriage, V, 291; 297; 301; ordination, IV, 530; as to penalties, VIII, 96; profession of faith, VIII, 504; religious state, III, 214.

Origin as to ordination, IV, 422.

Ownership, naked, III, 277 f.

P

Pachomius, St., III, 1.

Pammachius, III, 4.

Papal altars, IV, 174 f.; blessing, IV, 359; institutions, III, 48.

Papers, investigation of, VII, 245 f.

Pardon of penalties, who grants, VIII, 105 f.; conditional, VIII, 238.

Parents, as to baptism, IV, 53 f.; catechetical instructions, VI, 349; consent to marriage, V, 79; duties to children, V, 330; in need, III, 213.

Parish, better, VII, 431; in charge of religious, III, 323 f.; as to confessions, IV, 256 f.; as to confraternities, III, 454 f.; division of, VI, 506 ff.; incorporation of, II, 514 f.; 560 f.; as to domicile, II, 14 f.; election to, II, 524; erection of, II, 201 f.; as to interdict, VIII, 207 ff.; as to marriage, V, 278 f.; name of, II, 505; national, II, 201 f.; origin, II, 505 f.; reservation, II, 523; union of, VI, 501; 512 f.

Parish priest of chapters, II, 453; origin (see pastor), II, 505 f.

Parochi consultores, II, 419 f.; VII, 406; 430.

Participation, in crimes, VIII, 47 ff.; 100; in duelling, VIII, 404 f.

Paschal Communion, IV, 238 f.

Passion, in crime, VIII, 43; 100.

Passionists, III, 17.

Pastoral duties, neglect of, VIII, 464.

Pastors, appointment of, II, 455 ff.; as to baptism, IV, 38; charitable works, II, 554 f.; duties, in general, II, 543; 552 f.; as to clerical vocations, VI, 376; as to catechism, VI, 343; as to strange preachers, VI, 360; neglect

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

of, VII, 464 f.; examination, concursus, II, 527 ff.; funerals, VI, 133 f.; hearing confessions, IV, 256 f.; 307 f.; irremovable, II, 517; VII, 409 ff.; marriage, V, 42; 57; 102; 275 f.; 271; Mass for the people, II, 540 f.; parish-books, II, 556 f.; VIII, 596 ff.; religious, II, 520; III, 360 f.; VII, 542; removable, II, 517 f.; VII, 441 ff.; residence, II, 545; VII, 449 ff.; rights parochial, II, 536 f.; qualities, II, 516 f.; processions, VI, 264; sick-calls, II, 554; unity and possession, II, 534 f.; transfer, VII, 445 ff.
Pastor bonus, IV, 128 f.
Patriarchs, II, 286 f.
Patrimony, title to ordination, IV, 467.
Patrini, of baptism, IV, 75 ff.; of confirmation, IV, 118 ff.; of duels, VIII, 405.
Patron, of churches, VI, 26; Saints, VI, 240.
Pauline Privilege, V, 346 ff.; 373.
Paulists, III, 18.
Peculium forbidden, VIII, 480.
Pedagium, II, 66.
Pedum rectum, II, 216.
Penal laws, VIII, 12; abrogation of, I, 63; 78; VIII, 95; remedies, VIII, 71 f.; 264 ff.
Penalties, VIII, 58 ff.; history of, VIII, 62 f.; cessation of, VIII, 239; definition, VIII, 66 f.; kinds, VIII, 69 f.; in particular, VIII, 112 ff.; vindictive, VIII, 71; 235 ff.; determined, VIII, 72; undetermined, VIII, 72 f.; preceptive, VIII, 73; 90; interpretation of, VIII, 78 f.; application of, VIII, 89 ff.; liable who, VIII, 93 ff.; when taking effect, VIII, 102 ff.; remission of, VIII, 106 ff.
Penance, Sacrament of, IV, 249 ff.; minister of, IV, ib.; place of, IV, 350; reservation of sins, IV, 311 ff.; subject of, IV, 337 ff.; wholesome, IV, 297; as penalties, VIII, 71 f.; 263; 271 ff.
Pension, of benefices, VI, 573; of pastor, VII, 432; suspension from, VIII, 249; 257; title of ordination, IV, 468.
Penuria sacerdotum, IV, 136.
People's consent not required, II, 47.
Percussio clericorum, VIII, 376 ff.
Peregrini, I, 90 f.; II, 14 ff.; as to baptism, IV, 38 f.; as to confession, IV, 283; as to court in Rome, VII, 19; as to penalties, VIII, 95.
Perfection of religious state, III, 43 f.
Perjury, VIII, 309 f.
Permission for rel. house, III, 86 f.
Per modum actus, VI, 80; 162; 217.
Perplex case, V, 105 f.
Persona moralis (see corporation), II, 1 f.; 23 ff.
Personal appearance in court, VII, 96.
Personatus, II, 426.
Persuasio iuris, I, 107.
Petitory action, VII, 120; 141 f.
Pews in church, VI, 208.
Philosophy, III, 294; VI, 398.
Phrenesis, IV, 64.
Physicians, in marriage cases, V, 425.
Place for baptism, IV, 85 f.; command or prohibition to stay in, VIII, 258; for h. Communion, IV, 245; for Confirmation, IV, 116; for examining witnesses, VII, 221; as to interdict, VIII, 166; 208 f.; for marriage, V, 321 f.; for Mass, IV, 168 f.;

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

for novitiate, III, 230; 240; for ordination, IV, 545; for postulancy, III, 202; for publication of banns, V, 60 f.; for sentence, VII, 315; for summons, VII, 166; for trials, VII, 83.
Placetum regium, VI, 339; VIII, 330 f.; 335.
Plaintiff, in marriage cases, V, 416 f.; at trials, VII, 95 f.; religious as, VII, 101 ff.; must prove, VII, 193.
Podagium, II, 67.
Poena, VIII, 66 f.
Poenitentiaria, S., II, 265.
Poenitentiarii, II, 266.
Polyandry, V, 3.
Polygamy, V, 3; 17 f.; 357.
Pomp as to interdict, VIII, 206 f.
Ponens, VII, 195.
Pontificals, of abbots, III, 29 f.; of bishops, II, 356 f.; suspension from, VIII, 223 f.
Pope, election of, II, 117 f.; VIII, 321 f.; insignia of, II, 214 f.; laws, decrees, ordinances, VIII, 328; obedience to, III, 95 f.; VIII, 324; pardon of penalties, VIII, 107; power, II, 207 ff.; VIII, 84; promoted by, IV, 414; sacred person, VIII, 378; supreme administrator, VI, 577; teaching office, VI, 325; titles, II, 214 f.; verbal injuries to, VIII, 380 f.
"Populis" of Gregory XIII, V, 361.
Portio paroecialis, VI, 146.
Positions at trials, VII, 189.
Positive act of will, V, 239 f.
Possession, action, VII, 120; 141 f.
Post, forsaking of, VIII, 500.
Posters, for banns, V, 62; for Mass-stipends, IV, 200.
Postulancy for religious, III, 201.
Postulation of indignus, VIII, 487 f.; of religious, III, 127; term for election, II, 149.
Postulator for beatification, VII, 387.
Poverty religious, III, 45; 273 f.
Power, abuse of, VIII, 505 f.; delegated, ordinary, II, 170 f.; of religious superiors, III, 103 ff.; of order, II, 191 f.; of Church in marriage, V, 22 f.
"Praesumpserit," VIII, 99; 299; 304; 352; 392; 478; 498; 502; 513 f.; 516.
Praesumptio iuris, de iure, VII, 268 f.; 336.
Praemonstratensians, III, 9.
Praepositus, II, 425.
Praestationes, II, 541.
Prayers for absolution, IV, 294; for excommunicated, VIII, 184.
Preachers, preaching, VI, 338 ff.; 351 ff.
Prebendaries, II, 430 f.
Precariae, II, 108.
Precedence, II, 36 ff.; of assistants, II, 577 f.; of associations, III, 441; of bishops, II, 375 f.; of canons, II, 443 f.; in certain cases, VII, 403 ff.; of religious, III, 62 f.; of rural deans, II, 504; regarding funerals, VI, 144; withdrawal of, VIII, 250.
Precept, nature, I, 104 f.; to non-resident clerics, VII, 455; to concubinarians, VII, 462; penalty, VIII, 14; 72; penal remedy, VIII, 269; who may impose, VIII, 82 f.
Precious Blood Fathers, Sisters, III, 18; 22.
Precious things, III, 185.
Prefects, prefectures apostolic, II, 200 f.; 310 ff.
Prelates, election, name, II, 124 f.; 48 f.; "nullius," II, 331 ff.; religious, III, 104.
Prescription, nature of, VII,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

151 ff.; as to benefices, VI, 521; church may use, VI, 566; interrupted by summons, VII, 171; things not subject to, VI, 567 f.
Presentation in advowson, VII, 528 ff.; of indignus, VIII, 487 f.
President of chapter, II, 26 f.
Presumption, I, 86; circumstantial evidence (iuris), VII, 268 f.; of condonation, V, 373; gravis, levis, violenta, VII, 272.
Presumptive baptism, V, 146.
Pretext, VIII, 438; 520.
Prevention of admonition, VII, 405; of competency, VII, 23.
Preventive power, VIII, 87.
Priest's funds, VII, 434 ff.
Prima facie evidence, VII, 259.
"Prima Sedes," VII, 11.
Principals in crime, VIII, 50 f.
Priors cloistral, III, 121; conventional, III, 105.
Prisca, I, 21.
Private baptism, IV, 35 f.; defence, VIII, 290 f.; Mass and prayers, IV, 215; VIII, 185 f.; 205 f.
Privation for attempted marriage, VIII, 477; in spirit, goods, VIII, 66 f.; in censures, VIII, 118 f.; as penalty, VIII, 249; for clerics, VIII, 256; of episcopate, VIII, 499; for non-resident clergy, VIII, 463; of office, II, 163 f.; of wearing clerical dress, VIII, 259.
Privileged altars, IV, 365 f.
Privileges, I, 75; 152 ff.; abuse of, I, 169; acquisition of, I, 154 f.; communication of, I, 157 f.; III, 333 f.; II, 524; division of, I, 153 f.; interpretation of, I, 162 f.; loss of, I, 164 f.; use and non-use, I, 168 f.; of novices, III, 243 f.; of religious, III, 333 f.; Pauline, V, 346 ff.; of priests for confirmation, IV, 101 f.; by excommunicated, VIII, 188 ff.; fori violated, VIII, 363 f.; canonis violated, VIII, 376 f.; lost by apostasy, VIII, 470 f.
Privilegia, I, 13; canonis, II, 58 f.; fori, II, 59 ff.; immunitatis, II, 64 f.; loss, II, 68 f.
Probatio plena, semiplena, VII, 192.
Procedure, in general, VII, 3 ff.; criminal, VII, 380 f.; order of, VII, 75 f.; ordination trials, IV, 550 ff.; for irremovable pastors, VII, 409 ff.; for removable pastors, VII, 441 ff.; against non-resident clerics, VII, 449 f.; against concubinarians, VII, 457 ff.; against neglectful pastors, VII, 464 f.; ex informata conscientia, VII, 475 ff.; in inflicting penalties, VIII, 86 f.; in matrimonial cases, V, 400 ff.
Processus informativus, II, 344 f.
Processions, VI, 255 ff.; of confraternities, III, 456; of Corpus Christi, VI, 257 ff.; of Tertiaries, III, 447.
Proctor, VII, 198.
Procurantes abortum, VIII, 400.
Procurators, general, III, 150 f.; of religious, III, 147 f.; for resignation, II, 157.
Professio fidei (text) I, 69 f., VIII, 503 f.
Profession religious, admission to, III, 254 ff.; illegal, VIII, 514 f.; in danger of death, III, 244; effects of, III, 271 ff.; formalities, III, 263; impediment, V, 189 f.; invalid, III, 288; VIII, 474; obligations following, III, 267 f.; renewal of vows, III, 267; rights following, ib.; simple,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google solemn, III, 253 f.; temporary, III, 257 f.

Professors of seminaries, VI, 401; in religious houses, III, 292 f.
Prohibentes, VIII, 331.
Promotor fidei, VII, 388; 392.
Promotor iustitiae, II, 392; in criminal action, VII, 360 f.; in dismissal of religious, III, 399; in marriage cases, V, 417; at trials, VII, 41.
Promulgation of laws, I, 80 f.; impeded, VIII, 332.
Proof, of baptism, IV, 95 f.; of confirmation, IV, 124; of ordination, IV, 548 f.; at trials, VII, 191 ff.
Propagation of heresy, VIII, 287 ff.
Property-right of the Church, VI, 549 f.; action, VII, 120; administration, VI, 577 ff.; division and transfer, VI, 558; of single churches, VI, 553; of provinces, III, 178; of religious, III, 172 ff.; of religious houses, III, 178 f.; renunciation of, III, 244 f.; 277 f.; 281 f.; in transfer of religious, III, 368 f.; usurped, converted, VIII, 386 ff.
Propositions, condemned, VIII, 291 f.
Propositum of being ordained, IV, 512.
Protection of Apostolic See, III, 27 f.
Prothonotaries, Apostolic, II, 322.
Provocation, VIII, 43; to disobedience, VIII, 327; to duel, VIII, 405.
"Providentissima," of Bened. XV, I, 64 ff.
Province, religious, change of, III, 48; 79; ecclesiastical, erection of, II, 200 f.
Proxy, marriage by, V, 25 ff.
Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals, I, 24 ff.
Puberes, II, 10.
Public, crime, VIII, 15; defence, VIII, 290 f.; propriety (imp.), V, 212 f.; sinners, IV, 229 f.; V, 157.
Publication of banns, V, 56 ff.; of ordination, IV, 524; of process, VII, 301 f.; of sentence, VII, 316; of witnesses, VII, 231.
Publisher (see editor), VI, 432; 463.
Punctatores, II, 434.
Punishment of religious, III, 338 f.; in cases not exempt, III, 344.
Purgatio canonica, VIII, 285.

Q

Quarta funeris, VI, 147.
Quashing of actions, VII, 147 ff.
Quasi-domicile, II, 15; manual Masses, IV, 185; parishes, II, 201 f.; IV, 39 f.
Querela nullitatis, VII, 56; 328 ff.
Quest (see begging), III, 83 f.; 347 ff.; for church-purposes, VI, 560.
Questioning of parties, VII, 186 f.; repeated, VII, 230; 250; of witnesses, VII, 225 f.
Questions, incidental, VII, 80; 282 ff.; in report of religious, III, 463 ff.

R

Raptus, V, 192 f.; VII, 150.
Ratification of election, II, 146 f.; neglect of, VIII, 492 f.
Ratio peccati, VII, 6.
Rationabilitas of custom, I, 110 f.
Ratione sui, VIII, 139; 426.
Reading of books, VI, 463; VIII, 295; faculties for, VI, 478 f.
Reason, destitute of, VIII, 27.
Rebuke, VIII, 267.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Rebuttal of pastors, VII, 425.
Reception of Sacraments from excommunicated, VIII, 179 f.; 182 f.; from censured, VIII, 447 f.; simoniacal, VIII, 445 ff.
Receptores, VIII, 288.
Recognitio, VII, 250.
Reconciliation of churches, VI, 42 ff.
Reconsecration, VI, 8.
Reconventio, VII, 79; 139.
Record of baptism, IV, 94 f.; of church blessing, VI, 7 f.; of confirmation, IV, 123; of deaths, VI, 150; of marriage, V, 311 f.; of ordination, IV, 548 f.; of pious foundations, VI, 613 f.
Recourse, II, 184; from censures, VIII, 121 f.; in certain cases, VII, 408; to civil authority, VIII, 330 f.; from susp. ex informata conscientia, VII, 438; if impossible, VIII, 161; to lay power, VIII, 337; in occult cases, VIII, 241; by pastors, VII, 428; to S. Poenitentiaria, VIII, 160; from vindictive penalties, VIII, 237 f.
Rectors of churches, II, 166; 580 ff.
Recurrentes, VIII, 330; 333.
Redemptorists, III, 17.
Reditus, VIII, 391.
Redress, legal, VII, 317; 333.
Reduction of pious obligations, VI, 615 f.
Referees in trials (referendarii), VII, 38, 54.
Regino of Prüm, I, 26.
Regressus in benefices, VI, 543; VII, 424.
Regulares, III, 48; as to papal blessing, IV, 360; place of trials, VII, 84; absolution from censures, VIII, 150 f.
Rehabilitation of infamous, VIII, 248.
Reincidentiae, sub poena, VIII, 142; 160.
Relapse into crime, VIII, 46.
Relatio status of diocese, II, 364; of religious, III, 132; 463 ff.
Relationship, of blood, V, 201 f.; exception to judge, VII, 64; not affected by infamy, VIII, 247; spiritual, IV, 83; 122; V, 215 f.
Relics for altar, VI, 89; alienation of, VI, 244 f.; authentication of, VI, 247 f.; exposition, VI, 251; VIII, 316; sale, profanation, trading, VI, 253; VIII, 315.
Religio, in general, III, 47; crimes against, VIII, 301 ff.; clericalis-laicalis, III, 48; exempta-iuris pontificii, III, 47 f.
Religious, III, 48; apostates, fugitives, III, 381 f.: as to building of churches, VI, 15; as to books, VI, 455; as to catechetical instructions, VI, 347; as to competent court, VII, 20; 36 f.; as to confession, IV, 280 f.; 310; as to dignities, III, 354 ff.; as to dismissed, III, 409 f.; funeral of, VI, 122 f.; incardinated, III, 376 f.; as to pious foundations, VI, 614; as pastors, III, 360 f.; as plaintiffs, VII, 101 ff.; as to preaching, VI, 352 ff.; as to processions, VI, 259 f.; subject to the Ordinary, III, 531 f.; as to penalties, VIII, 346; 379; 450; 460.
Religious state, definition, III, 40 ff.; leaving of, III, 371 ff.; origin of, III, 1 ff.; separation of marriage, V, 375.
Remission of penalties, VIII, 106 ff.
Remissoriales litterae, VII, 397; 401.
Removal of assistants (cu-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google rates), II, 576 f.; of attorneys, VII, 115; of chancellor, II, 407 f.; decree of, VII, 429; of irremovable pastors, VII, 409 ff.; of removable pastors, VII, 441 ff.; of Vicar-General, II, 395; 405.

Renewal of marriage-consent, V, 380 ff.; 384.
Rent, VI, 605 f.
Renunciation of instantia, VII, 184; of property by novices, III, 244 ff.
Repairing of churches, statues, VI, 58 ff.; 243; of damage, VIII, 53; for false accusation, VIII, 424; for illegal alienation, VIII, 394.
Requirere as to marriage, V, 281.
Requisites for ordination, IV, 454 ff.; for religious state, III, 205 ff.
Res (see things), IV, 2 f.; adhuc integra-non integra, I, 150; II, 142; VII, 171.
Rescripts, I, 124 ff.; false, VIII, 422.
Reservation, ceases, IV, 334 ff.; of censures, VIII, 129 ff.; disregard of, VIII, 350 ff.; of sins, IV, 311 ff.; of parishes, II, 523.
Residence of bishops, II, 358 f.; of coadjutors, II, 382; of canons, II, 458 f.; of pastors, II, 545 ff.; parochial to leave, VII, 433; procedure against violators, penalty, VII, 449 f.; VIII, 462 f.; of religious superiors, III, 128.
Resignation of benefices, offices, II, 155 ff.; VI, 542 f.; accepted by pastor, VII, 423; invitation to, VII, 419 f.; to laymen, VIII, 501 f.
Res iudicata, VII, 183; 334 ff.
Restitutio in integrum, VII, 136; 331; 336 f.
Restitution for illegal alienation, VIII, 394; of income (fructus), VIII, 325 f.; by religious, III, 195.
Retaining forbidden books, VI, 464; VIII, 295; sacred species, VIII, 303.
Retraction of accusation, VIII, 425.
Retreat of clergy, II, 70 f.; of ordinands IV, 526 f.; of pastors (vacation), II, 545 f.; of postulants, III, 202; of religious, III, 307; of seminarians, VI, 403 f.; as penal remedy, VIII, 265.
Retroaction of laws, I, 82; of sanatio, V, 390.
Revalidation of marriage, V, 380.
Revenues, by excommunicated, VIII, 192 f.; restitution, VIII, 225 f.
Revival of censures, VIII, 142.
Revocation of jurisdiction, IV, 278 f.
Right of married persons, V, 325; of succession, II, 379.
Ring, II, 84; 336; IV, 148; VI, 271 f.; 421 f.
Rite (adverte), IV, 20.
Rites, of baptism, IV, 65 ff.; of h. Communion, IV, 244; of confession, IV, 347; of marriage, V, 291; 304 ff.; of Mass, IV, 152 f.; of ordination, IV, 528 ff.; of religious profession, III, 263 f.; of sacramentals, IV, 565 f.; sacred as to interdict, VIII, 206 f.; various, II, 20 ff.
Roman court, II, 246 ff.; VII, 24 ff.; tribunals, VII, 24 ff.
"Romani Pontificis," of Pius V, V, 361 ff.
"Romanos Pontifices," of Leo XIII, III, 87 ff.; 217.
Rota Romana, S., II, 267; VII, 26; 50 f.
Rubrics of the Mass, IV, 156; in semipublic oratories, VI, 77.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Rules as to penalties VIII, 94.
Rules, general, I, 72 f.; of religious, III, 50.
Ruthenians, as to confirmation, IV, 104 f.; as to marriage, V, 292; as to ordination, IV, 421.

S

Sacrament, Bl., Fathers, III, 18.
Sacramentals, IV, 558 ff.; to excommunicated, deprived, VIII, 178 ff.; 249; in interdicted places, VIII, 204 f.
Sacraments, in general, administration, IV, 19 ff.; indelible character, IV, 22; exactions, IV, 31; by and to religious, III, 141; 307 f.; rites, IV, 25; to excommunicated, interdicted, VIII, 179 ff.; 213; in interdicted places, VIII, 204 f.; by suspended clergy, VIII, 231 f.; simoniacal, VIII, 445 f.; h. oils, IV, 28.
"Sacramentum poenitentiae," IV, 341.
Sacred Heart, Ladies of the, III, 22.
Sacred ministry assisted by religious, III, 322.
Saints, patron, VI, 240; pictures, VI, 241; 243; worship, VI, 236 f.
Salary, of pastors, II, 540 f.
Sale, VI, 604.
Salesians, III, 18.
Saloons, II, 87 f.
Saltum, per, ordination, IV, 460.
"Salvo iure S. Romanae Ecclesiae," I, 153.
Sanatio in radice, V, 389 ff.; 447 f.
Sanction of law, VIII, 12.
Scandal, banns of marriage, V, 63; h. communion, III, 308; for dismissal, III, 395; 408; marriage-dispensation, V, 101.
Scandalo remoto, V, 101.
Scare, VIII, 333 f.
Schismatics, books of, VI, 468; 483; VIII, 295; burial, VI, 153; VIII, 360; definition, VI, 335; as to marriage, V, 299; penalty, VIII, 276 ff.; as to sacraments, IV, 21.
Scholarships, VI, 394.
Scholasticus, II, 425.
Schools, Catholic, VI, 411 f.; mixed, III, 68; of religious, III, 91.
Scienter, VIII, 299; 315; 354; 356; 446 f.; 496.
Scolopii, III, 17.
Scripture, Holy, VI, 434 f.
Scrutiny, II, 135 f.
Sea, confession at, IV, 289 f.
Seal of confession, IV, 300 f.; violation of, VIII, 441 f.
Seats in church, VI, 204; 206 f.
Secrecy in certain cases, VII, 406; of crimes, VIII, 240; dispensation from, ib.; of marriage, V, 317; of votes, II, 133; of witnesses, VII, 204.
Secretariate of State, II, 274.
Sects, condemned, III, 427; at marriages, V, 155 f.; non-Catholics, VIII, 279; Masonic, VIII, 340 f.
Secularization of church property, III, 373 ff.; VIII, 388.
Security-going, II, 85 f.
"Sede vacante," II, 474 f.; 487.
Sedes impedita, II, 472 f.
Seisin, VII, 18; 80; 120.
Self-defence, VIII, 42; 377.
Seminaries, IV, 453; VI, 373 ff.; V, 322.
Seminaristicum, VI, 380.
Senators, deputies, II, 90 f.
Senium, for Extreme Unction, IV, 402.
Sentence, contents, VII, 313; of dismissal, III, 406 f.; execution of, VII, 346 f.; formalities, VII, 314; in matrimonial cases, V, 428 f.; ratification of, III, 407; at trials, VII, 308 ff.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Separation of married persons, V, 369 ff.; 376 f.
"Septimae manus," V, 415; 422 f.
Sepulcher (altar), VI, 89.
Sequestration, VII, 124 f.
Sermons, in Advent and Lent, VI, 367; incentive, VIII, 348; subjects, VI, 368.
Servants of religious, III, 143 f.
Server for Mass, IV, 150 f.
Servile work, VI, 173.
Servitude, as error, V, 231 f.
Servites, III, 143.
Sextum, crimes against, VIII, 413 ff.; 416 ff.; 436.
Sick, allowed to vote, II, 132; calls, II, 554; communion of, IV, 218 f.; confessor to sick Sisters, III, 163 f.; in exempt houses, III, 141 f.; dismissal of, III, 262.
Signatura Apostolica, II, 268; VII, 53 f.
Signs for marriage-consent, V, 249 f.; of repentance, VI, 157.
Simony, IV, 5 ff.; penalties for, IV, 12 ff.; VIII, 445 f.; 491 f.
Simple priests for confirmation, IV, 101; profession, III, 259; vows, III, 56.
Simulation, VIII, 307; 435; 438.
Singers, at non-Catholic worship, VI, 197; religious women, VI, 211.
"Si preces veritate nitantur," I, 129.
Sisters (sorores), III, 48; 67; of charity, III, 22.
Sitting, of judge, VII, 316.
Skullcap, II, 336 f.; III, 351 f.; IV, 148.
Slaves, as to orders, IV, 499; penalty for slavery, VIII, 409.
Societies, pious, III, 416 ff.
Society of Jesus, III, 14 f.
Sodomy, VIII, 414.
Soldiers, as to banns, V, 60.
Solemn, baptism, IV, 35; profession, III, 259 f.; V, 344; vows, III, 56 f.
Solicitation, duty of denouncing, IV, 341 f.; false accusation of, VIII, 424 f.; 437 ff.; witnesses, VII, 225.
Somaschans, III, 16.
Sortilegia, VIII, 313.
Sources of penal law, VIII, 4 f.
Species of h. Eucharist, IV, 152 ff.; 155; desecration of, VIII, 301 f.
Spiritism, VI, 203; VIII, 313.
Spolium, VII, 18; 80.
Sponsors, for baptism, IV, 75 ff.; for confirmation, IV, 118 ff.; excommunicated, VIII, 188.
State and Church, as to crimes, VIII, 19 ff.; 330 f.; as to liturgy, VI, 200; in U. S., I, 246 ff. (see Church).
Status of dismissed religious, III, 411 f.
Statuta Ecclesiae Antiqua, I, 22.
Statutes of chapters, II, 446 f.; of confraternities, III, 432.
Sterility, V, 172.
Stipendium pingue, II, 543; IV, 205.
Stipends for Masses, IV, 175; kinds of, IV, 183 ff.; number of, IV, 187 f.; 190; obligation, IV, 189; fixed by Ordinary, IV, 191; stipulations added, IV, 192 f.; traffic punished, VIII, 311.
Stipes (altar), VI, 88.
Stole-fees, taxes, II, 542; refusal to pay, VIII, 396.
Stone for altar, VI, 86.
Straightening marriages, V, 159 f.
Students, burial of, VI, 124 f.; of exempt religious, III, 141 f.; reading books, VI, 475 f.; of seminaries, VI, 408.
Studies, of clergy, higher, II, 74; VI, 423; of religious,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

III, 292; of seminaries, VI, 306 ff.; of Canon Law, I, 49 ff.
Stuprum, VII, 150; VIII, 414.
Stylus Curiae, I, 131.
Subdelegation, in general, II, 176 f.; as to marriage, V, 284.
Subjects, who, II, 17 f.; V, 57 f.; of baptism, IV, 46 ff.; of confirmation, IV, 112 f.; of Extreme Unction, IV, 401; of ordination, IV, 444 ff.
Subreptio, I, 131.
Subscriptions solicited, VIII, 348.
Subsidy, charitable, VI, 563 f.
Suffragans, II, 483.
Suffragium (see vote), VIII, 183 f.; 189.
Suicide, as to burial, VI, 155; irregularity, IV, 491; penalty, VIII, 403.
Summa theologica, III, 295; IV, 402.
Summae, I, 53 ff.
Summaria, I, 44.
Summary proceedings, III, 398; VII, 286; 408.
Summons, at trials, VII, 163 ff. contents of, VII, 165; effect, VII, 170; intimation, VII, 166; necessity, VII, 170.
Sunday, VI, 160.
Supellex, sacra, VI, 267 ff.; of departing pastor, VII, 433.
Superiors, religious, III, 47 f.; 103 ff.; power of higher and lower, III, 104 f.; duties, III, 299 ff.; general, III, 114 f.; blessing of churches, VI, 6; defendants, VII, 101 f.; election of, III, 121; feasts and fasts, VI, 167; novitiate and profession, III, 214; 256; qualities, III, 116 f.; regarding confessions, IV, 258 f.; 304 f.; reservation of sins, IV, 317; 321 f.; rights of, III, 300 f.; report to Holy See, III, 132; term of office, III, 119 f.; visits of houses, III, 133 ff.; VIII, 517 f.; dimissorials, IV, 434; VIII, 513; as to coercive power, penalties, VIII, 82; 85; 94 f.; absolution from censures, VIII, 156; as to interdict, VIII, 199; as to enclosure, VIII, 370 ff.; as to apostates and fugitives, VIII, 470 ff.; illegal alienation, VIII, 393; obedience to, VIII, 325.
Superstition, VIII, 312 f.
Support of churches, VI, 555; of ministers, VI, 539 f.; of deposed clerics, VIII, 260 f.; of religious houses, III, 48; 82.
Suppression of religious institutes, III, 65 ff.; 74 ff.; 77; of confraternities, III, 439.
Surgery, forbidden, II, 89.
Suscipere, in baptism, IV, 80.
Suspension, in general, VIII, 164 f.; from benefice, VIII, 218 f.; against concubinarians, VII, 461; definition, VIII, 217 f.; of dismissed religious. III, 411 f.; a divinis, VIII, 217; effects of, VIII, 218 ff.; ex informata conscientia, VII, 361 f.; 469 ff.; from office, VII, 471; VIII, 218 f.; forbidding ordination, IV, 448; partial-total, VIII, 220 f.; particularis-communis iuris, VIII, 227; provisional, VIII, 87; of sentence, VIII, 238; temporary, of charges, VIII, 250; as vindictive penalty, VIII, 255; for bination and non-fasting, VIII, 305; for insubordination, VIII, 349; for unlawful confirmation, VIII, 430 f.; for hearing confession, VIII, 433 f.; for sollicitatio, VIII, 439; for illegal consecration, VIII, 444; for simoniacal orders, VIII, 445 ff.; for illegal or-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

dination, VIII, 450 f.; for absence from conferences, VIII, 456; for neglect of ceremonies, VIII, 457; for not wearing clerical dress, VIII, 459; for fugitive religious, VIII, 472; for religious superiors, VIII, 513.
Suspicion of heresy, VIII, 284 f.; 361 f.; 446.
Sylvester S., Sylvestrines, III, 13.
Syndicus, VI, 581.
Synods, diocesan, II, 384 ff.

T

Tabernacle, key, VI, 221 f.; light, VI, 225.
"Tametsi," V, 267 ff.; 303.
Tangere in baptism, IV, 80.
Taxative, irregularities, IV, 477; VII, 414; penalties, VIII, 72; 244.
Taxes for dispensations, V, 130; for funerals, VI, 144 f.; to be fixed, VI, 565; overcharge, VIII, 511 f.; refusal to pay, VIII, 396.
Teaching, office, VI, 318 f.; condemned doctrine, VIII, 290 f.; forbidden, VIII, 293 f.
Temporal possessions of the Church, VI, 549 ff.; VIII, 384; of religious, III, 172 ff.
Tempus utile, continuum, I, 122 f.; VII, 137; in elections, II, 143; in taking office, II, 160.
Tenere in baptism, IV, 80.
Terminus a quo, I, 119 f.
Tertiaries of S. Francis, III, 20 f.; of S. Dominic, III, 21 f.; secular, III, 443 f.; general absolution, IV, 363.
Testament, clergymen's, VI, 277; who may make, VI, 570.
Testes, in general, VII, 203 ff.; contrarii, incerti, VII, 237; singulares, VII, 238 f.; ultronii, VII, 213; vacillantes, varii, VII, 237; (see witness).
Testimonials, for novitiate, III, 215 ff.; for ordination, IV, 429; 513 ff.
Text, original, VI, 434.
Theatres, forbidden, II, 92 f.
Theft, rapine, VIII, 409.
Theologicus cursus, III, 295; IV, 458; VI, 398.
Things, nature, kind, IV, 2 ff.
Threat of censures, VIII, 122.
Thursday, holy, Communion on, IV, 240.
Time, for baptism, IV, 85 ff.; for confirmation, IV, 116 f.; for h. communion, IV, 245; for Mass, IV, 160 f.; for Mass-obligations, IV, 197 f.; for marriage and banns, V, 60 f.; 319 f.; for novitiate, I, 121; III, 231; for ordination, IV, 532 f.; reckoning of, I, 115 ff.; for trials and finishing of, VII, 59; 83.
Title, of basilica, VI, 49; of churches, VI 25; honorary of religious, III, 147; of ordination (see titulus), IV, 464 ff.
Tithes, III, 29; 39; VI, 560.
Titulus, ordinationis, IV, 464 ff.; lack and loss, IV, 468 f.; missionis and servitii, IV, 471 f.; for religious, IV, 474 f.; as to prescription, VII, 154; not taken away, VIII, 257; ordination without, VIII, 450; coloratus, VII, 63.
Tolerati, excommunicated, VIII, 173; 177; 182; 185; suspension, VIII, 218.
Tonsure, II, 43.
Tractatus, I, 53 f.; praevius in election, II, 127.
Tractus successivus, VII, 156.
Trading, trafficking forbidden to clergy, II, 95 ff.; VIII, 460 f.; with Masses, IV, 186 f.; VIII, 311; with relics, VIII, 315.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Trahere, VIII, 364.
Transfer, of apostates, VIII, 468 f.; of archconfraternities, III, 460; of bishops, II, 477 f.; of episcopal sees, VIII, 245; of religious, III, 364 ff.; procedure for, VII, 444 f.; from office or benefice, VIII, 255; of parochial residence, VIII, 245; effects of, III, 368 f.
Trial, apostolic, VII, 397 ff.; delegation of, III, 407; for dismissal of religious, III, 396 f.; requisites for, III, 400 f.; 400 f.; ecclesiastical, VII, 1 ff.; matrimonial, V, 400 ff.; ordination, IV, 550 ff.
Tribunals, delegated, VII, 57 f.; first instance, VII, 24; ordinary, VII, 25; 46; for religious, III, 398 f.; Roman, VII, 24 ff.
Trinitarians, III, 9.
Trinity, Blessed, VI, 187.
Trustees of churches, VI, 55 f.
Tutors, II, 11 f.; VII, 97 f.

U

United States, Church in, I, 247 ff.; rectors, II, 166.
Unity, crimes against, VIII, 275 ff.; of marriage, V, 17.
Universities, VI, 418.
Urgent cases, absolution in, VIII, 158 ff.
Urgere censuram, VIII, 150; contractum, V, 43.
Ursulines, III, 22.
Usurpation of church property, VIII, 386 ff.
Use, what, III, 248; of marriage, V, 266; non-use of privileges, I, 168.
Usufruct, III, 248.
Usus forensis, I, 99.
Utensils sacred, VI, 267 ff.

V

Vacancy of benefices by profession, III, 286; of offices, II, 107; 115; by apostasy, VIII, 276; by not wearing clerical dress, VIII, 459; acceptance of non-vacant offices, VIII, 497; of episcopal see, II, 470 ff.
Vacation, of bishops, II, 358 f.; of canons, II, 458 f.; of pastors, II, 545 f.
Vagi, I, 91 f.; II, 18; competency as to, VII, 19; confessors of, IV, 282 ff.; marriage, V, 66; 74; 76 f.; 288 f.
Vallombrosians, III, 8.
Venerable, title, VI, 237; beatification, VII, 396.
Veritas dictorum, VII, 220.
Versions of the Bible, VI, 435 f.
Vessels, sacred, VI, 267 f.; handling of, VI, 286.
Vestments, liturgical, IV, 147 f.; blessing, care of, VI, 267 ff.
Viaticum, administered. IV, 221; as to interdict, VIII, 204 f.; pastoral rights, II, 536; to religious, III, 141 f.
Viatorians, III, 18.
Vicar Capitular, II, 480 f.; qualities, II, 484 f.; resignation, II, 494; rights, II, 487 ff.; powers denied, II, 489 f.; precedence, II, 492; term expires, II, 495 f.; cannot erect religious institute, III, 65; as to confirmation, IV, 108; as to dimissorials, IV, 427; as to testimonials, IV, 519; as to s. supellex, VI, 281; as to examination, IV, 523; as to marriage assistance, trials, V. 276; 407; as to consecration of churches VI, 4; as to interdict, VIII, 199; as to documents, VIII, 507; (see Ordinary).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Vicar-General, origin of, II, 393 f.; appointment, number, II, 395 f.; qualities, II, 397 f.; of prelates nullius, II, 335 f.; precedence, honorary rights, II, 403 f.; religious cannot be, III, 355; as officialis, VII, 30; term expires, II, 405; powers: in general, II, 400 ff.; appointment to offices, II, 110; blessing chrism, IV, 98; books, VI, 477; building churches, VI, 14; consecration of churches, VI, 4; dimissorial letters, IV, 426; irregularities, IV, 505; as to marriage, V, 89; 276; 407; as to religious. III, 65; 362 f.; testimonials, IV, 519; coercive, inflicting penalties, VIII, 85; pardoning penalties, VIII, 107; as to interdict, VIII, 199; as to penal remedies, VIII, 268; as to penances, VIII, 273.
Vicars Apostolic, II, 200 ff.; 310 ff.; IV, 413; 427.
Vicarii paroeciales, II, 559 ff.
Vicariatus foranei, II, 201.
Vigilance, penal remedy, VIII, 269 f.
Viles homines, VII, 370.
Vinculum perdurans, V, 325.
Vindictive penalties, VIII, 71; 235 ff.; common to clerics, VIII, 251 ff.; common to faithful, VIII, 250 ff.
Violence, in chapter acts, II, 29 f.; in crime, VIII, 38 f.; done to body, VIII, 376; extorted pardon, VIII, 111; in marriage, V, 244; 281; in ordination, II, 194; 198.
Virgines, s., III, 19.
Virgines subintroductae, II, 81.
Vis et metus, II, 29 f.; in marriage, V, 243 ff.; as to novitiate, III, 207; as to profession, III, 256; as to ordination, II, 194 f.
Visit, canonical, VIII, 517 ff.; of diocese, II, 367 f.; ad limina, II, 365 f.; by religious superiors, III, 133 ff.
Visitation Nuns, III, 22.
Visits of religious, III, 320.
Vita communis of canons, II, 424 f.; of religious, III, 45 f.; VIII, 480.
Vitandi, VIII, 173 ff.; 177 f.; 185; 189; 193; communication with, VIII, 352; in suspension, VIII, 218; violence to Pope, VIII, 378.
Vitium mentis, II, 569 f.
Vivae vocis oraculum, I, 154.
Vocation to clerical state, VI, 376; to religious state, III, 199 f.
Voluntarium in causa, VIII, 24; as to marriage, V, 244.
Voluntariness, VIII, 39.
Vote, active—passive, II, 127 f.; deprived of, ipso iure, II, 130 f.; III, 375; 376; VIII, 470; to be deprived, VIII, 327; 339; 374; 421; 439; 480; majority of, II, 25; number, II, 143; requisites, II, 132; religious superiors, III, 121 ff.; for religious profession, III, 262; right of religious, III, 270.
Vows, definition, VI, 289; commutation, III, 301; VI, 307; dispensation, VI, 303; irritation, VI, 299; impediment, V, 135 ff.; obligation, VI, 295; observance of, III, 209 f.; of religious state, III, 44 f.; 55 ff.; of suppressed institutes, III, 77 f.; reserved, VI, 293; wife's nullified, V, 330.

W

Wages, fair to employees, VI, 585.
Warning, canonical, VIII, 86; 267 ff.; 279; 286; 362; 395; 413; 457; 458 f.; 480; 481; 504.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Water, baptismal, IV, 66 f.; mixed with wine, IV, 152 f.
Weight of testimonies, VII, 235 f.
White Fathers, III, 18.
Wife, as to domicile, II, 17; as to husband's orders, IV, 498; as to marriage rights, V, 329; as to novitiate, III, 209.
Will, collective, VIII, 165; last of clergy, VI, 277; 574; of religious, III, 285; who may make, VI, 570; sacred, VI, 570 f.
Wine for Mass, IV, 152 ff.
Witchcraft, magic, etc., VIII, 313.
Witnesses, at engagement, V, 42; at marriage, V, 161; 312; 422 f.; at trials, VII, 201 ff.; in certain cases, VII, 408; as to privilegium fori, VIII, 364.
Women, not allowed to serve Mass, IV, 151; as to ordination, IV, 445; as to solicitation, VIII, 441; suspected, VII, 458 f.; violating enclosure, VIII, 371 f.
Word of God, VIII, 176 f.; 212.
Writing, for appointment, II, 117; in certain cases, VII, 405; deposition of witnesses, VII, 228; division, union of benefices, VI, 512; of servants of God, VII, 392; invitation, VII, 420; reasons against transfer, VII, 447; to non-resident clergy, VII, 453.
Worship, divine, VI, 186 ff.; private, public, VI, 189; public by religious, III, 331 f.; of Saints, images, relics, VI, 235 f.; impediment of marriage, V, 179 ff.

Y

Year, how reckoned, I, 116; for fulfilling Mass-obligations, IV, 199; for novitiate, I, 121; III, 231 f.

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

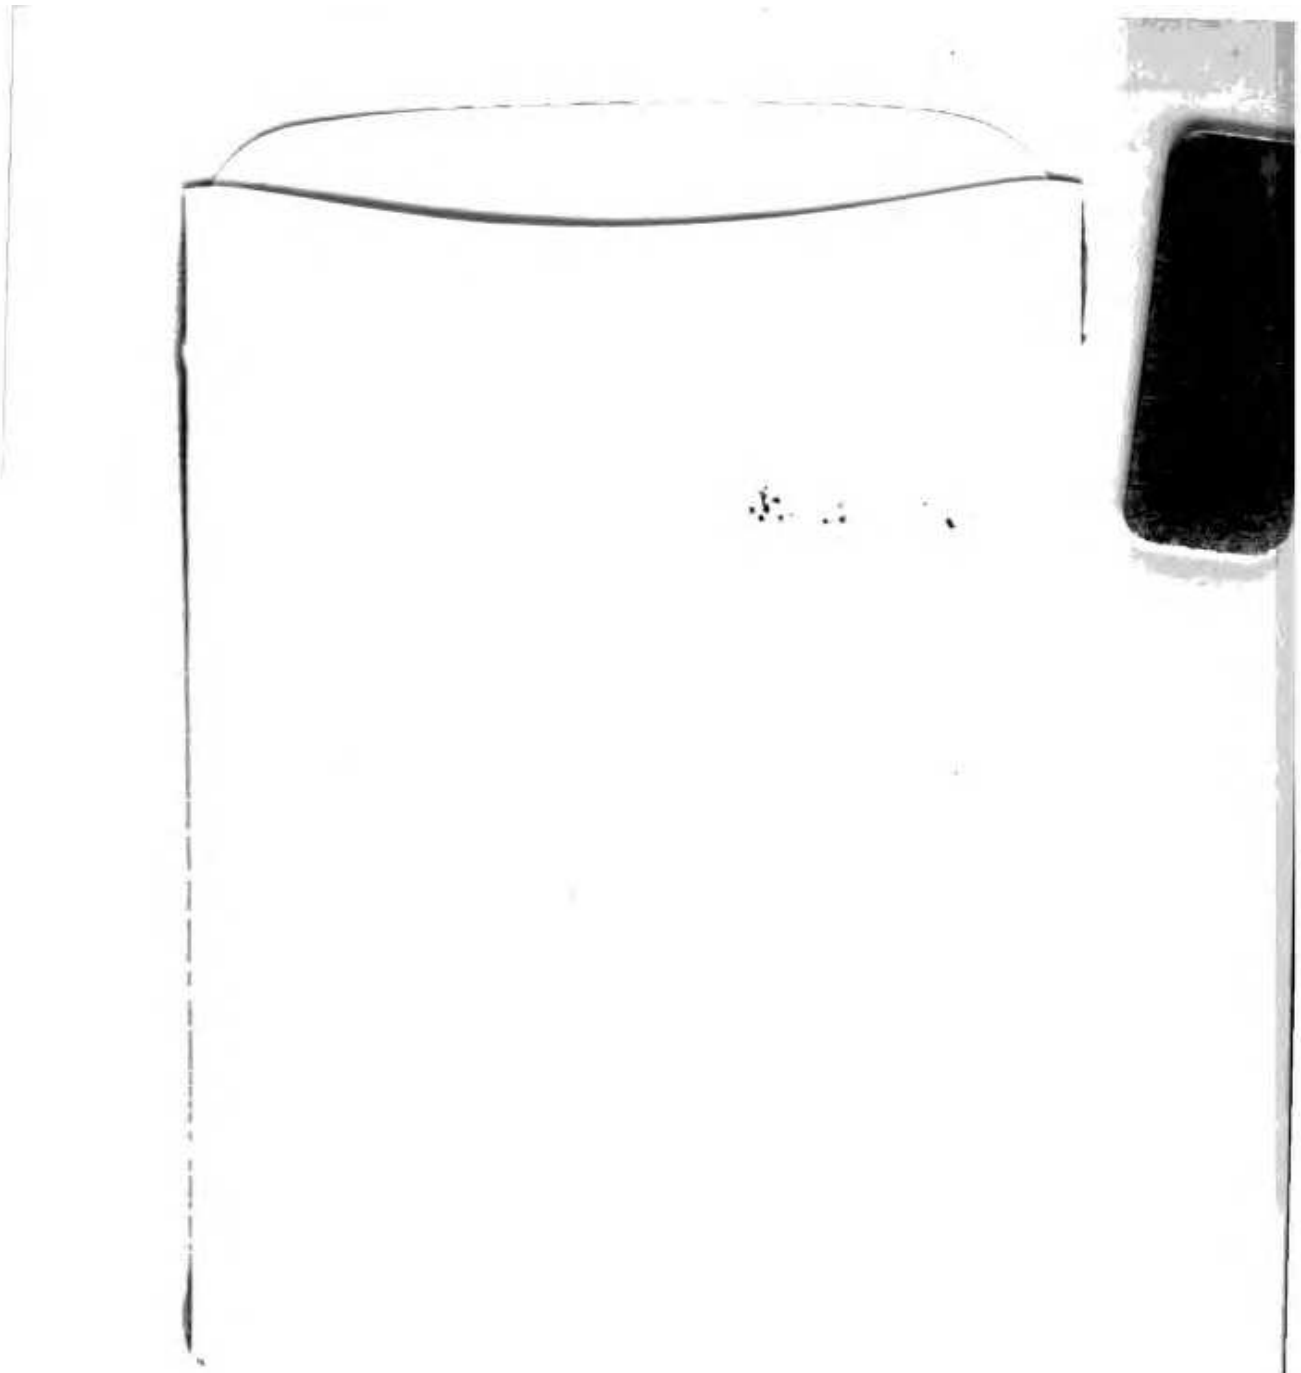
Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

89059250977

b89059250977a

may be kept



FC

from last dat
will be char

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Digitized by Google

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google

8905925097 7

B890592509 77A

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN

Generated for Steve Santiago (Arizona State University) on 2012-01-03 0 :00 GMT / Public Domain in the United States, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-us-google